asking him to pay anything under the Act of 1879, and they cannot do so. They are founding themselves upon their own powers of rating, which are conferred by the 75th and 77th sections of the Act of 1895 and the relative schedules. Section 75 says,—"You shall levy the rates from every vessel using the harbour," and section 77 says,—"You shall make no distinction between persons who are of the same classes as those defined in the schedule." It seems to me that the Commissioners' position is complete. As I have said, the exemption under the Act of 1879 was less an exemption than a limitation of the power of imposing rates; and the present Commissioners are not seeking to impose rates, and could not do so, under the Act of 1879. Therefore it seems to me that this is merely a case where a person comes under the rating powers of the new Act, and is entirely adrift and set free from all the relations established between him and the rating authority repealed. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is wrong, and I think it unnecessary to go in any detail into the illustrations of the unworkableness of the suggested dovetailing of the new Act and the old. From the 1st of October it seems to me that every one is bound to pay, without distinction as to previous trading or not, according to the schedule of the Act of 1895. The present demand is for the rates under that Act, and there is no good defence to that claim.

LORD ADAM.—As I understand the case, the defenders, who are the owners of a ship called the "Linn o' Dee," made certain voyages, and used the harbour of Aberdeen, which is the property of the Commissioners, the pursuers, during the months from October to December, and the Commissioners proposed to levy from them the rates contained in the schedule of the Act of 1895 which is applicable to that period. No objection, as I understand, is taken to the amount of the rate if only the defenders are liable for the rate at all under the Act of 1895, and that is the question which we have to decide. There is no doubt whatever, and it is not disputed, that the Act of 1895 came into operation on 1st October of that year; and there is as little doubt that it specifies in the schedule appended to it certain rates which are to be levied on ships of certain classes, these rates being authorised by the 75th section of the Act. The answer made is that between January and September 1895 the "Linn o' Dee" made ten or more voyages, and had thus acquired an exemption from rates for the remainder of the year prior to the coming into operation of the Act of 1895. Undoubtedly, if the Act in existence prior to 1895 had continued in force, that would have been so, but unless the exemption is to be found in the 10th section of the Act of 1895 there is no such exemption under that Act. The whole defence arises upon that section, and the first question is whether it applies to the circumstances of this case at all, of which I have all along been doubtful.

The section says that, notwithstanding the repeal of the previous Act, "everything before the commencement of this Act done or suffered" shall continue to be valid. Nobody could conceive that that was meant to refer to payment of rates; one would rather conceive, as Mr Ure said, that it was meant to apply to acts of a different kind, namely, acts of a contractual nature.

However that may be, I am of opinion that the charging of these rates under the new Act falls under the exception contained in section 10, and that it is expressly provided by the Act of 1895 that all vessels using the harbour subsequent to that Act coming into operation shall pay the rates in the schedule. I cannot read the Act otherwise. It expressly says that from the commencement of the Act vessels of class 3 shall pay certain rates, and I must say that that is inconsistent with any presumed right to exemption altogether. The view which I take of this case is that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is wrong, and that everyone must pay the rates specified in the schedules in terms of the Act of 1895. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—Under the Aberdeen Harbour Act of 1879 it is provided that "for any vessel included in class 3 which shall have made ten voyages in any one year from January to December inclusive, no rates shall be paid on any additional voyages." The vessel in question, the "Linn o' Dee," having made ten voyages, as is admitted, in the year 1895, if the Act of 1879 had continued to regulate the collection of rates, then beyond question the vessel would have been entitled to perform as many subsequent voyages in that year as the owners pleased, without payment of harbour rates. But an alteration has been made by Act of Parliament in the financial year for the transactions of the Harbour Trust, and the year now commences on the 1st October instead of beginning on the 1st of January and continuing to the 31st of December. The question is, as I represent it to myself, whether the exemption from rates to which the "Linn o' Dee" was entitled can continue any longer than the 1st day of October, at which time the Act of 1895 came into operation with its appropriate schedule of rates. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to the argument of the defenders that they are entitled to continue to sail their ship free of rates to the end of December in 1895, carrying on, as it were, the Harbour Trust year as if the Act of 1879 had been in operation, and that right his Lordship holds to be acquired under the 10th section of the Act of 1895. Now, that section occurs in the second part of the statute, and without attaching importance to the title of that part or division of the statute, which is probably not included in the text of the Act, I may remark that the 10th section occurs as one of a series of clauses which primarily relate to the legal effect of the transfer of the harbour from one body of Commissioners to another body differently constituted. These clauses are primarily intended to perpetuate the rights, obligations, and liabilities of the Trust in the persons of the new body corporate. But I do not doubt in the least that as regards any consensual contract between the Commissioners and outside parties the obligations of the Trust would, either under section 10, or in virtue of the general parliamentary law, which presumes that statutes are not retrospective in their operation, continue to affect the Harbour Trust. But I agree with your Lordships, differing in this point only from the Lord Ordinary, that the owners of "Linn o' Dee" had no contract right of any kind to a continuance of the privilege of sailing their ship to the end of the year 1895 without payment of rates.

In the first place, the Harbour Commissioners are not a body constituted for profit. They are a public trust authorised and entitled to levy rates for the purpose of maintaining the harbour, and, very naturally, the rates are laid upon those who take benefit from the harbour. But it is very clearly explained in section 92 that the harbour rates are only applicable to payment of debt, and maintenance and improvement of the harbour. Therefore we do not begin with a right acquired by means of something in the nature of a contractual payment. The money paid by the owners is strictly a rate assessed on tonnage or on goods for the purpose of maintaining a public work for the benefit of the persons who contribute to it; and the contribution under the Act of 1879 is limited, for vessels of this class, to ten voyages in a year, probably because those who had promoted and obtained the Act of 1879 were satisfied that a rate limited in this way would be sufficient to provide funds adequate to the purposes of the Act. But the right to enter the harbour without payment of rates results merely from the circumstance that the Act of 1879 did not authorise the imposition of any rate except for the first ten voyages. What proves to my mind that there is no contract—at least no consensual contract—is this, that neither the owners nor the Harbour Commissioners had any power to vary the statutory liability by charging a different rate by agreement, or by dispensing with any rate which the statute authorised. If we are not within the 10th section the case, I think, is quite clear, because the new Act of Parliament expressly provides that in place of total exemption there shall come into operation a reduced rate, and that upon the completion of eight voyages; and it is also most clearly expressed that the clause in question shall be applicable to years beginning in October. From this I should infer that the full rate is exigible for every voyage subsequent to 1st October 1895. What confirms me in this view is that if anything different had been intended there would have been provided—what we are familiar with in many Acts of Parliament—temporary provisions which would have regulated the rates during the intercalary period from October to December. But I think, in the contemplation of the Act, there is no intercalary period. The powers of the old Act, which would subsist in perpetuity if Parliament had not interfered, are suddenly cut off in the middle of a year—I mean on the 30th of September 1895—and the new Act takes effect from and after that date. I was at first impressed with the apparent equity of the conclusion which the Lord Ordinary had come to, but, on farther consideration, I am satisfied, for the reasons assigned by your Lordship, that the judgment is not well founded, and that we ought to sustain the reclaiming note.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree. If the defenders had acquired a right under any lawful contract with the former Commissioners, they would not be deprived of it by the new Act. But there is no element of contract in the imposition of the rates in question. They are fixed by statute. The Commissioners were not empowered by the Act of 1879 to charge any further rate on a vessel which had already paid rates on ten voyages during the currency of a single year, until the beginning of a new year. I cannot consider this to be a vested right of the kind which Parliament intended to save from the operation of the new Act. It is not a particular right arising to an individual from contract, or from the conduct of the Commissioners, but a general right of the lieges to use the harbour on paying the statutory rates. Accordingly, when the defenders rest their case upon this so-called vested right, it seems to me that the question they really raise is, whether they have acquired a right to use the harbour on payment of the rates provided under the old Act, instead of those under the new. That question does not appear to me to admit of discussion. The Act of 1895 provides a new schedule of rates, and for the computation of the period for which they are to be payable special dates are fixed for the beginning and end of the year. The effect of this is that the Commissioners can levy rates which they were not entitled to charge under the old Act. Section 10 provides as a necessary consequence of the transference of the rights of property and actions to the new Commissioners, that they shall be held as representing their predecessors to the effect of enforcing their rights and being responsible for their liabilities; and, accordingly, any claim which had arisen against the former Commissioners will be equally available against the new Commissioners, and must be determined on the same grounds as if the old Act had not passed. But this cannot mean that in any case the old conditions of rating are to continue in force after the new Act has come into operation.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor so far as it related to the sum of £45, 1s. 3d., and decerned against the defenders for payment of that sum to the pursuers.

Cook v. Sinclair & Co.

ALEXANDER SKENE COOK, Pursuer (Respondent).—Craigie—Laing.
WILLIAM SINCLAIR & COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—W. Campbell—Abel.

Bankruptcy—Illegal Preference—Action by creditor for delivery of estate assigned by bankrupt within sixty days of bankruptcy—Competency—Act 1696, c. 5—The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 10.—Where a debtor within sixty days of bankruptcy assigns part of his estate in violation of the Act 1696, c. 5, any creditor at the date of the alienation has a title to reduce the assignation, but he has no title to recover the subject of the assignation for behoof of himself and the other creditors.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen at the instance of Alexander Skene Cook "as trustee acting for behoof of the creditors of Marshall Thomson, chemist, Ballater, and as an individual," against William Sinclair & Company, wholesale druggists, Aberdeen, craving the Court "to ordain the defenders—(First) To deliver to the pursuer two bills for £100 each, dated 16th October 1894, at twelve months' date, granted by Alexander Hadden, chemist, Ballater, to Marshall Thomson, chemist, Ballater, and indorsed and delivered by the said Marshall Thomson to the said defenders on or about the 17th day of October 1894, and failing their doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to ordain the defenders to pay to the pursuer the sum of £200 sterling, with the legal interest thereof from the date of citation hereon till payment; and (second) to pay to the said pursuer the sum of £8, 1s. 6d. sterling, with the legal interest thereon from the 23d day of October 1894 till payment."

The pursuer averred that he was a creditor of Marshall Thomson in a debt of £12 or thereby incurred prior to 17th October 1894; that he was also trustee for Marshall Thomson under a trust-deed for behoof of creditors, dated 9th November 1894, and that he represented qua trustee creditors to the extent of £600; and that Marshall Thomson became notour bankrupt on the 24th November 1894.

He further averred that Marshall Thomson had on 17th October voluntarily indorsed to the defenders the two bills in question for £100 each in further satisfaction or security of a debt due to them, and pleaded;—(1) The indorsation and delivery of the two bills in question having been done by the debtor voluntarily within sixty days of notour bankruptcy, in further satisfaction of a pre-existing debt, is voidable at pursuer's instance so far as to his prejudice as trustee foresaid, and as an individual, and decree should pass as craved, with expenses.

The defenders averred that the bills were indorsed to them for value, and in turn indorsed by them to a third party for value received.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action is incompetent.

On 11th July 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) dismissed the action.*

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff, and on 16th August 1895 the Sheriff (Crawford) repelled the defenders' first and second pleas in law so far as they applied to the pursuer's title qua creditor, but sustained them so far as they applied to his title qua trustee, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute.

A proof having been led, the Sheriff (Crawford) on 26th February 1896 pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, finds (1) that Marshall Thomson, designed in the petition, became notour bankrupt on or about 24th November 1894; (2) that the two bills in question were indorsed by him voluntarily to the defenders in satisfaction of a prior debt, and within sixty days before his bankruptcy; (3) that the said indorsation constituted an illegal preference under the Act 1696, cap. 5; (4) that at the date when the said preference was granted, the pursuer was a creditor of the bankrupt to the extent of £11, 4s.; (5) that the pursuer is trustee for behoof of the creditors of the bankrupt by virtue of the trust-deed libelled; (6) that it is averred by the defenders, and not disputed, that they have indorsed the said bills to a third party for value: Therefore decerns and ordains the defenders to pay to the pursuer as trustee foresaid the sum of £11, 4s., with interest as con-

* "NOTE.— . . . It is pleaded in defence that the bills having been indorsed to and negotiated in bona fide, and for value, by the defenders, the pursuer should not get decree, but a preliminary plea or pleas are stated of no title and incompetency.

"It seems clear on authority (Fleming's Trustees v. M'Hardy, 19 R. 542), that the trustee as trustee under the trust-deed has no title to sue, no power being given to him in the deed. It seems equally certain that qua creditor he has a right to call the transaction in question, but the point seems to me here to be whether he can combine the two characters in the instance of his summons, and cure the defect in his title as trustee by alleging the character of personal creditor. In my opinion it is inadvisable he should be allowed to do so. I do not think the action could go on with the instance as it stands, and I think it would be equally inadvisable, if not incompetent, to dismiss the action, so far as at the instance of Mr Cook as trustee, and go on with it at his instance as an individual.

"I, of course, reserve his right to bring an action solely at his individual instance as a creditor if he should desire to do so."

cluded for, being the amount of the debt due to him as a creditor of the bankrupt, to be held by him in trust, first for payment of any dividend or dividends upon the said debt to which he may be found entitled, and to the extent of the balance, if any, for behoof of the bankrupt's other creditors." *

Cook v. Sinclair & Co.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The pursuer's title to sue as trustee was clearly bad. The action was therefore at the instance of a creditor. A petitory action was, however, incompetent. It was absurd to suppose that a £12 creditor should be entitled to get delivery of bills for £200, and there was no precedent for his getting payment of their contents as trustee for the other creditors. The only competent process was reduction, the effect of a decree in which would put the whole creditors on an equal footing.

Argued for the respondent;—It was admitted that the pursuer had no title to sue as trustee, but qua creditor he had a good title. A reduction was excluded, for the bills had passed for value into the hands of third parties. A petitory action was therefore the only remedy available. Though the pursuer might not be entitled to recover the £200, yet the effect of a decree for the amount of his debt would be to set aside the preference and so benefit the whole of the creditors.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The ground of action in this case is that a bankrupt trader, within sixty days preceding his bankruptcy, assigned a bill of exchange in satisfaction of a prior debt. The action is instituted in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire, and in it the pursuer, who is a voluntary trustee for creditors, and also a creditor in his own right, claims delivery of the bill. It appears that the bill has been assigned for value, and in the judgment appealed from, the Sheriff, while rejecting the title of the voluntary trustee to sue on behalf of creditors, has sustained the title of the pursuer as an individual creditor, and decerned in his favour for the amount of his debt, subject to the condition that the sum shall be held by the pursuer as trustee for distribution.

To a right understanding of the conditions of the case it is necessary to consider the effect of the statute of 1696 upon the funds of the bankrupt, which are alienated contrary to its provisions. I think it is consistent with

* "NOTE.—The facts of the case, the bankruptcy, the preference, and the pursuer's title as a prior creditor, are not disputed. But it is maintained that there is no remedy competent to him under this petition. The difficulty about the proper form of decree, so far as it is real, does not in my view arise from the two capacities, easily separable, in which the pursuer has raised his action, but from a different cause. The prayer of the petition for payment of the value of the bills (failing delivery, which is now out of their power) is not expressly restricted to his capacity as trustee, and may fairly cover a prayer for payment of whatever he is entitled to claim as an individual. But as he is a creditor on a bankrupt estate, it is difficult to ascertain how much that is. The pursuer's remedy would have been more simple had reduction been competent, but it is expedient and in conformity with the intention of the statutes that creditors on small estates should have in substance the same means of redress in the Sheriff Court as in the Court of Session. Therefore it would be wrong to be deterred by a technical difficulty which does not seem to be insuperable. The decree which I have given will, I think, meet the justice of the case."

No. 178. July 2, 1896. Cook v. Sinclair & Co.

the language of the statute, and the decisions following upon it, that preferences of the character described are annulled when challenged by a creditor who was entitled to participate in the distribution of the debtor's estate at the time of the alienation, but this and no more is the remedy given by the Act of Parliament. The effect of the nullity is simply to restore the alienated subject to the position in which it was before the alienation. It becomes assets of the bankrupt's estate, and may be attached by the diligence of the creditor who has established the nullity, and also by other creditors whose claims are prior in time to the alienation. The reduction of a fraudulent alienation does not give the creditor any right against the assignee to require payment or delivery of the subject to himself. Such a proceeding would amount to establishing a new preference in place of the one which was cut down, and would be entirely contrary to the spirit and purpose of the statute. I do not doubt the competency of combining with the action of reduction a conclusion directed against the bankrupt for payment of the creditor's claim, but the decree obtained under such a conclusion would only enable the creditor to use diligence against the fund. If his claim were already constituted he might at once proceed to use diligence against the fund which he had restored to the estate; other creditors entitled to the benefit of the reduction might do the same, and the equality of distribution, which is the principle of all bankruptcy legislation, would then be secured by virtue of other statutes establishing pari passu preferences amongst arresters and adjudging creditors. The action before us contains no conclusion against the bankrupt for payment of the pursuer's claim, and accordingly, if this were a competent action for enforcing the nullity established by the Act of 1696, the only decree which the pursuer could obtain would be a decree annulling the indorsation of the bill in question, and restoring the pursuer and all other creditors in the same position against the injury which had been done to them by the withdrawal of this part of their debtor's estate.

But I am unable to concur in the opinion of the Sheriff that this is a competent action, even to the limited effect which I have explained. The 10th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, provides that "deeds made void by this Act, and all alienations of property by a party insolvent or notour bankrupt which are voidable by statute or at common law, may be set aside either by way of action or exception." The effect of this provision is that, if the title of the alienee is pleaded in defence to an action otherwise competent, the Act of Parliament or the rule of the common law may be pleaded in reply. For example, if goods are alienated by a fraudulent contract, but are undelivered in the hands of the bankrupt, the Act of 1696 may be pleaded in answer to the defence, that the bankrupt or anyone holding in his right is under contract to deliver to the favoured creditor. Or, again, the Act may be pleaded in defence to an action for delivery at the instance of the favoured creditor. But, in the circumstances of the present case, the challenging creditor has no action against the indorsee of the bill for payment or delivery of the bill to himself, nor has he any action to compel payment to a voluntary trustee unless such trustee represents the whole body of the creditors interested, in which case only a trustee duly authorised to reduce preferences might be entitled to claim the fund. But the creditor's right is to have the indorsation reduced in order that his diligence may not be impeded, and this right can only be made effectual by an action of reduction in the Court of Session. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be sustained, and the action dismissed as incompetent.

Railway—Construction and maintenance—Level Crossing—Ultra vires—Statute—Incorporation of special Act with general Act—Railway Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 16.—The Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 16, enacts, that "subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway, or the accommodation works connected therewith hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works—that is to say, they may," inter alia, "make or construct in, upon, across, under, or over any . . . roads . . . within the lands" described in the plans or mentioned in the books of reference "such . . . roads, ways, passages . . . as they think proper; They may erect such . . . yards, stations, . . . machinery, apparatus, and other works and conveniences as they think proper; They may from time to time alter, repair, or discontinue the before-mentioned works, or any of them, and substitute others in their stead; and they may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing and using the railway."

A special Act obtained by a railway company in 1853 incorporated the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, "so far as not hereby altered or varied," and by its 37th section enacted,—"The railway hereby authorised shall be completed within five years from the passing of this Act, and on the expiration of such period the powers by this Act, or the Acts incorporated, granted to the company for executing the railway, or otherwise in relation thereto, shall cease to be exercised except as to so much of the railway as shall then be completed."

The special Act gave compulsory powers to take land for a double line of railway, and to carry the railway over a public road near B. station on the level. The company acquired sufficient land for a double line, but within the five years they only formed a single line.

In 1890 the Board of Trade, under the powers of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, required the railway company to interlock the signals at the stations on their line. After the new interlocking arrangements at B. station had been inspected by the Board of Trade inspector, he intimated that they would not be passed unless a loop-line at the station was extended. To effect this alteration it was necessary that a second line of rails should be laid across the road. The District Committee of the County Council thereupon brought an action against the railway company to have it declared that the defenders were not entitled to encroach on the road beyond the line of the existing gates and fences at each side of the level crossing in order to lay the new rails, and for interdict. The pursuers did not dispute that the defenders in constructing the line would have been entitled to lay double rails across the road, but maintained that under sec. 37 of the special Act the defenders' power to do so lapsed at the end of five years.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that sec. 37 of the special Act did not, after the lapse of the five years, deprive the company of the power given by sec. 16 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, to do all acts necessary for using the railway, and that the defenders were entitled to lay a double line of rails across the road, as this had become necessary for using the railway.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

Section 34—"That it shall be lawful for the Lords of the said Committee (i.e., the Board of Trade), if it shall appear to them to be necessary for the public safety, at any time either before or after the railway hereby authorised to be carried across the said roads on the level thereof shall have been completed and opened for public traffic, to require the company, within such time as the said Lords shall direct, and at the expense of the company, to carry any of the said roads either over or under the railway by means of a bridge or arch, in lieu of crossing the same on the level, or to execute such other works as under the circumstances of the case shall appear to the said Lords best adapted for removing or diminishing the danger arising from such level crossings."

Section 37—"That the railway hereby authorised shall be completed within five years from the passing of this Act, and on the expiration of such period the powers by this Act, or the Acts incorporated herewith, granted to the company for executing the railway, or otherwise in relation thereto, shall cease to be exercised, except as to so much of the railway as shall then be completed."

from Buchlyvie to Gartmore and Aberfoyle. The company under their compulsory powers acquired sufficient land from the various private proprietors to lay a double line of rails, but only a single line was laid, and there was only a single line across the level crossing over the Gartmore and Aberfoyle road, which was situated a few yards to the east of Buchlyvie Station.

In November 1890 the Board of Trade, under the powers conferred by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, called on the North British Railway Company (to whom the rights and obligations of the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Company had been transferred) to interlock the signalling apparatus at their stations. After this work had been completed at Buchlyvie Station it was on 15th February 1894 inspected by Major Marindin, one of the Board of Trade inspectors, with a view to reporting whether the work could be passed by the Board as satisfactory. At the time of Major Marindin's inspection there was only one platform at Buchlyvie Station—on the north side of the line. A loop-line branched off immediately to the west of the level crossing, and rejoined the main line at a point beyond the platform, but had no platform alongside it.

"They may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing and using the railway."

The Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 92), after enacting (section 7) practically in terms of section 34 of the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Act, 1853, quoted above, enacts by section 8 as follows:—"If the Board of Trade certifies that the public safety requires that additional lands be taken by the company for the purpose of the work directed by the Board of Trade to be executed, the company may, subject to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, or the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, as the case may require, enter upon, take, and use all or any part of the lands specified in the certificate of the Board of Trade as being necessary for the purpose of the work, and the Board of Trade before issuing the certificate shall cause at least three months' notice to be given to any person who may be entitled to claim, under the last-mentioned Acts or otherwise, compensation in respect of the taking of such lands or in respect of such work."

The Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 121), which enables, inter alia, new works connected with existing railways to be executed under authority of a certificate from the Board of Trade without obtaining a private Act of Parliament, when landowners and others beneficially interested are consenting parties, enacts, section 5,—"Notwithstanding anything in this Act it shall not be necessary for the promoters before applying under this Act for authority to make the railway, to enter into any contract with respect to any part of a turnpike road or public highway intended to be taken or used, or to be diverted or otherwise interfered with, for the purposes of the railway, but the Board of Trade, before they settle a draft of such a certificate as hereinafter provided for, shall be satisfied that due provision is made for the interests of the trustees or other persons having the management of every such road or highway, and for the safety and convenience of the public in relation thereto."

Section 8 enacts,—"The Board of Trade before settling the draft of a certificate, shall take into consideration any representation made to them, and shall duly inquire into the merits of any objection brought before them respecting the application."

Section 54 enacts,—"All the provisions of this Act which relate to the making of a railway shall extend and apply, mutatis mutandis, to the making or executing of any work connected with or for the purposes of a railway (as distinguished from the construction of a railway)."

July 2, 1896. Western District Committee of the County Council of Stirling v. North British Railway Co.

Major Marindin, as the result of his inspection, intimated to the railway company that the interlocking arrangements could not be passed unless a platform was erected for the loop-line, and unless the loop-line was carried further to the east and across the level crossing.

The Western District Committee of the County Council of Stirling, who had charge of the road at the point where it was crossed by the railway, learning of the proposal to double the rails at that point, petitioned the Board of Trade to prevent the railway company from carrying the proposal into effect, submitting that the time had arrived when the Board ought, in terms of section 34 of the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Act, 1853,* to require a bridge under or over the railway to be substituted for the level crossing; and the District Committee also requested the Board to suspend or recall whatever requirement or suggestion the Board might have made necessitating the doubling of the line at the point in question until the questions involved could be deliberately considered. In consequence of these representations Major Marindin held an inquiry at Buchlyvie on 30th May 1895.

On 16th June the railway company reconstructed the loop line, laying a second line of rails across the level crossing, and altering the position of the gates and gate posts at each side of the crossing.

Thereafter, in August 1895, the District Committee brought an action against the company, concluding for declarator that the defenders "are not entitled to encroach upon, by laying lines of rails or otherwise, or to occupy or interfere with, for the purpose of their railway or otherwise, the solum of the county road or highway" in question, "now vested in and under the control of the defenders, at a point near to, and to the east of Buchlyvie Station, in so far as the solum of said road is situated beyond or outside of the line of the gates and fences which existed, at each side of the said crossing previous to the execution of the operations" in question, and for declarator that these operations were illegal, "in so far as the defenders have encroached upon, by laying lines of rails or otherwise, or have occupied or interfered with the solum of the said road or highway beyond or outside of the line of the gates and fences which existed on each side of said level crossing previous to the execution of the said operations"; for decree ordaining the defenders "to take down and remove the gates recently erected by them at or near said level crossing, and to take up and remove the rails recently laid down by them at or near said level crossing, in so far as the said gates or rails interfere with or encroach upon the solum of the said road beyond or outside the line of the said gates and fences previously existing at said crossing, and generally to restore the solum of and accesses to the said road or highway to the condition in which they were at the said level crossing immediately prior to the execution of the defenders' said operations"; and for interdict.

The pursuers averred (cond. 6) that in consequence of the defenders' operations, "not only was the line doubled, but the existing gates and gate-posts at each side of the crossing were removed and new gates erected, with the effect of encroaching seriously upon parts of the solum of the said road which was previously outside the gates and fences at the crossing. A plan . . . is produced herewith, which shews the nature and extent of the encroachments thus made upon the road." (Cond. 7) "The said operations, at all events so far as they are executed upon ground outside the line of the previously existing gates and fences, are entirely illegal. The period limited by the 37th section of the said Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Act, 1853, for the completion of the works authorised by that Act has long since expired. The defenders are not proprietors of any portion of the solum of the said road outside or beyond the line of the former gates and fences. They had and have no right nor warrant whatever entitling them to encroach upon the said road in the manner above explained and shewn upon the said plan. The operations complained of, besides being illegal, are gravely prejudicial to the use and enjoyment of the said road by the public. . . ."

The defenders, in their answers, averred,—(Ans. 6) " . . . The accuracy of the plan produced by the pursuers and the alleged encroachments are disputed . . ." and, in their statement of facts, they further averred,—"Although the position of the gate-posts and gates at the level crossing in question has been altered, the area enclosed within the gates is actually less than formerly, and the gates and gate-posts, as now placed, constitute no encroachment on any right of the pursuers. . . . The use and enjoyment of the road by the pursuers and the public have been in no way interfered with by the defenders' operations. No additional obstruction to free progress along the road has been created, and for the purpose of passage, which is the only purpose in which the pursuers have an interest, the road is in every respect as good as it was before the operations complained of. The solum of the road does not belong to the pursuers, but remains vested in the proprietors of the adjacent lands. The pursuers have no title to sue in respect of any interference with the solum of the road. . . . There is no limitation in the Act of Parliament confining the railway company's powers to the laying of a single line across the road in question, and the railway company were entitled to double the line at any time they chose, and to enclose with gates such portions of the solum of the road crossed on the level under their statutory powers as were required for or in connection with a double line."

The pursuers pleaded;—The operations complained of being illegal and unwarrantable, decree of declarator, removal, and interdict, ought to be pronounced, with expenses, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The pursuers have no title and no interest to sue. (4) The operations complained of having been carried out by the defenders to satisfy the requirements of the Board of Trade, the pursuers have no right to insist in the conclusions of the summons, and the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The operations complained of not constituting an infringement of the pursuers' rights, and not being an encroachment on the road in question, the defenders should be assoilzied. (6) The operations complained of not having caused any new obstruction on the road, and the road being as suitable as ever it was for the purposes of passage, the defenders should be assoilzied. (7) The operations complained of having been within the defenders' rights, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

There was no proof.

On 24th January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders exceeded their powers and acted illegally in laying the line of rails complained of across the county road or highway described in the summons: Therefore, repels the defences, and to the extent and effect of the above finding, finds, decerns, and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses: Allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor of Court to tax and to report: Grants leave to reclaim." *

* "OPINION.—By the 32d section of the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Act, 1853, power was given to the Forth and Clyde Railway Company (now represented by the defenders) to carry their railway across the road in question on the level. The company acquired, under their compulsory powers, sufficient land to lay a double line of railway, but they only, in fact, laid a single line.

"The station at Buchlyvie is situated a little to the west of the level crossing, and, as required by the Board of Trade, the defenders made certain arrangements for interlocking signals at that station. Major Marindin inspected these arrangements on behalf of the Board of Trade, and the defenders aver that he intimated to them that unless they made certain alterations upon a loop-line which there was at the station, to enable trains to pass each other, he could not pass the interlocking arrangements. The alterations upon the loop-line involved carrying it across the level crossing. The defenders did accordingly carry the loop-line across the road, and made the necessary alterations upon the gates and fences, and the question raised in this case is whether they acted within their powers in doing so.

"It may be that if the defenders had not carried out Major Marindin's suggestions the Board of Trade would have refused to pass the interlocking arrangements, and the defenders would thereby have been compelled to do whatever was necessary to enable them to carry the loop-line over the road. I do not, however, think that the alteration of the loop-line can be regarded as having been done under an order of the Board of Trade, and the decision of the case therefore appears to me to depend upon the power of a railway company to lay an additional line over a level crossing after the line has been opened for traffic, and the powers conferred by the special Act have expired.

"A railway company cannot carry their line across a public road on the level unless their special Act gives them power to do so. If, however, power to cross a road upon the level is conferred, the company do not require to purchase any part of the road under their compulsory powers. They simply carry the line across the road, subject to the obligations imposed upon them by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and other general railway statutes, in regard to gates, fences, and so forth.

"The argument of the defenders was that by the power given to them in the special Act they were authorised to take across the road any railway which they were entitled to construct upon the lands acquired by them upon each side of the road.

"As they have lands sufficient for the purpose, they contended that they are entitled now to lay a double line upon these lands, and that if they have power to do so, they have also power to use the right of transit given to them, and to carry the line across the road.

"It seems to me that the question mainly depends upon the construction of the 32d section of the special Act, which gives the company power to cross certain roads on the level, and the 37th section which fixes the period for the completion of the works"—(His Lordship quoted the sections).

"I do not doubt that notwithstanding the latter section there were many works which the company could execute after the expiry of the five years. I think that they could execute any works for which they did not require

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The parties were at issue as to whether or to what extent the defenders' operations had encroached on the road beyond the line of the original gates; but assuming that there had been an encroachment to some extent (1) the pursuers had no title to sue, or at least in so far as they had a title to sue the action was irrelevant. If the defenders had proposed to acquire an additional piece of the solum of the road in property, and if the pursuers had been proprietors of the solum, it might have been incumbent on the defenders to shew that they had statutory authority to do what they proposed to do. But the defenders did not propose to acquire any part of the solum in property, and the pursuers were not the proprietors of the solum. The only right, both of the pursuers and of the defenders, was a right of passage merely, and the only interest and the only title of the pursuers was to see that the defenders in enlarging their right of passage did not prejudice the use of the road by the public. The pursuers had not set forth a relevant case of prejudice. They did not dispute the defenders' right to double the rails over the level crossing; the sum-statutory powers, but works for which they required statutory powers they could no longer execute.

"Now, in this case the company required statutory power to make their railway across the road in question. That power was given to them by the 32d section, which authorised them to cross the road 'in constructing the railway hereby authorised.' These words are, I think, important. The power is limited to crossing the road 'in constructing the railway.' These words appear to me to refer to the original construction of the railway, and not to additional works executed after its completion. Further, the power was a special power granted to the company by the Act, without which it is conceded that they could not have carried the railway across the road on the level. But the 37th section provides that after five years the powers granted to the company 'for executing the railway shall cease to be exercised.' A power to cross a road on the level in constructing the railway seems to me to be a power 'for executing the railway,' which after five years the company could no longer exercise.

"It is true that there is a saving clause in the 37th section,—'except as to so much of the railway as shall then be completed'—but I think that that is only intended to make it clear that nothing done during the five years in the exercise of special powers shall be challengeable after the expiry of the powers.

"In this case the saving clause appears to me to apply to the single line originally laid down. The power to cross the road expired except as to that line.

"That view seems to me to be consistent with all the statutory provisions of the general Acts in regard to level crossings. All the provisions in regard to the approaches, fences, and gates at level crossings appear to refer to the time when the railway is first made across the road, and there is not a single enactment, so far as I am aware, which contemplates the laying of an additional line across a road, by a company at their own hand, after the railway has been completed and opened.

"The defenders contended that it could not have been intended that a railway company should not have power, after the period for completion of the line had expired, to construct upon their own land a loop-line requisite for the proper conduct of traffic, because it would cross a road which the Legislature had authorised them to cross, unless they went back to Parliament and got a new Act. Now, I do not see any difference in principle between a company carrying a loop-line across one road, and doubling their line all along, with the result of doubling the number of rails over every mons was carefully framed so as to strike only at rails laid on ground which was beyond the line of the original gates, and in point of fact the rails themselves were laid wholly within that line, although there might be certain small encroachments with a view to the proper working of the new rails. Practically, the public using the road were no more inconvenienced by the level crossing in its present state than they had been before. At all events, assuming the relevancy of the action, there ought to be a proof. But (2) the defenders had statutory authority to do what they had done. It was not disputed that under section 32 of their Act they were entitled to have a level crossing over this road; nor was it disputed that they might have had a double line from the first; nor did the pursuers maintain that the defenders were not entitled to double their line now, provided that in doing so they did not encroach on the road. That being so, the doubling of the line over the level crossing was within the powers conferred by section 16 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, either as being a substitution in the sense of that section, or as being an act "necessary for maintaining, altering, or repairing and using the railway." The operation of section 16 was not limited to the five years specified in section 37 of the special Act.[1] The certificates provided for in section 8 of the Railway Clauses Act of 1863, and in sections 5, 8, and road crossed by the railway, and in both cases I think that (assuming the special Act to be in the same terms as in this case) the company would, prior to 1864, have required to get special powers from Parliament. Now, however, I rather think that the defenders could construct a loop-line by obtaining a certificate from the Board of Trade, under the Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1864. The main object of that Act is to enable railway companies to make branch lines without a special Act, when they can acquire all the land necessary by agreement. But, by the 54th section, the provisions of the Act, which relate to the making of a railway, are extended, and apply to 'the making or executing of any work connected with or for the purposes of a railway (as distinguished from the construction of a railway).'

"By the 5th section it is provided:—(His Lordship quoted the section).

"Now, if the defenders, in order to make the loop-line, had required to purchase land, and had come to an agreement with the owners of the land, I think that it is clear that they could have applied for a certificate from the Board of Trade for the construction of the loop-line, and the carrying it across the road, and I do not think that the fact that they have the land, and only require authority to carry the line across the road, would debar the defenders from taking advantage of the Act. I am inclined to think that the case would be within the scope of the Act, and that the defenders would be entitled to apply to the Board of Trade for a certificate authorising them to cross the road.

"The defenders further contended that the pursuers had no title to sue, as they are not proprietors of the solum of the road. I do not think that it is of any consequence that the pursuers are not the proprietors of the solum of the road. It is, in my opinion, sufficient that they have right to prevent any unauthorised or illegal encroachment upon, or obstruction of the road. The laying of a line of rails across the road for the use of engines and trains is undoubtedly an obstruction to which, if done without lawful authority, the pursuers are, in my opinion, entitled to object, and I do not think that it is necessary to consider whether, or to what extent, the public would suffer greater inconvenience or danger from two lines crossing the road than they were exposed to when there was only one line."

July 2, 1896.
Western District Committee of the County Council of Stirling v. North British Railway Co.

54 of the Railway Construction Facilities Act, 1864, had really no bearing on the present question. These enactments contemplated the case of a railway company which had to acquire additional land in order properly to carry on its work, and provided facilities for such acquisition without the necessity of going to Parliament. Here the company did not need to acquire any additional land in order to double its line throughout its entire length—apart from level crossings over public roads—and it had power to cross this road. The right to double the line across the road therefore followed as a matter of course from the right to double the line quoad ultra. If the time had come for making a bridge at this point instead of a level crossing, refusing decree in the present action would not prejudice the rights of the pursuers under section 34 of the special Act.

Argued for the pursuers;—Section 16 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, had no application, because it was inconsistent with section 37 of the special Act, and so was not incorporated with that Act.[1] In any case section 16 only applied to the case of works which were necessary to the construction of the railway, and "necessary" meant "physically necessary" not merely less expensive or more convenient.[2] In that sense the doubling of the line was not necessary. Emsley's[3] case was a case of a "substitution," which doubling a line could not reasonably be said to be. Further, Emsley's case was a decision on the special Act of the company there in question. Major Marindin had intimated what he thought necessary, but no order had been pronounced by the Board of Trade. The proper course was for the defenders to apply to the Board for a certificate under the Act of 1863, or under that of 1864. In that way all parties interested could have an opportunity of being heard on the whole question.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The North British Railway Company, which have come in place of the Forth and Clyde Railway Company, as owners of the railway line between Stirling and Balloch, have recently executed works at Buchlyvie Station to fulfil the Government requirements as regards safety by the establishment of block and interlocking signals. When these works had been carried out, and were submitted for approval to the Board of Trade inspector, he declined to pass them as being safe and satisfactory for the working of the line unless the company extended a loop-line at the station further eastwards than was then the case. There being at the east end of the station a level-crossing across a public road, the extension of the loop-line could not be made without the rails of the loop being laid across the road. The company already possessed land of sufficient breadth on both sides of the road for making this extended loop, and had, by their gates protecting the old level crossing, shut in, ever since the line was made, the space on which the rails of the extended loop-line would be placed. The railway company proceeded to make the extended loop, and the pursuers have raised this action of declarator and interdict, and concluding for removal of the rails so laid.

July 2, 1896. Western District Committee of the County Council of Stirling v. North British Railway Co.

The question is whether the railway company had power to do this piece of work. The answer must depend upon the construction to be given to statutory enactments, as, of course, the railway company could have no power to interfere with a public road unless it was given by Act of Parliament. In the statute by which the line was authorised, power was given to take the line across this road on the level, and accordingly the road has there been crossed by level crossing since the construction. But although their Act authorised a double line, and the works were constructed for a double line, only one line of rails was laid down. It is maintained by the pursuers that the power to lay down another line has been lost, as the 37th section of the Act authorising the construction declares that the powers of the Act shall cease to be exercised at the end of five years, "except as to so much of the railway as shall then be completed." I cannot say that it is to me at all clear that this restriction applies to the case in question, even as regards the laying down of a second line of rails where that may become necessary for the working of the traffic on a line the works for which have been completed for double running.

The power which under the Railway Clauses Act is given to railway companies "from time to time to alter," and to do all acts necessary for using the railway, might, I think, well apply to the use of two lines on a railway constructed for two lines, but used at first when traffic was small with only one line. To lay down additional rails as they may be required on the lands acquired seems to me not to be a power taken from them at the end of the five years. But I do not express any opinion upon that matter, as I think this case can be disposed of without giving any decision upon it.

The true question here is whether what the railway company have done is a work they are entitled to do after the five years for construction have expired. Now, that they could have done this work on lands belonging to themselves had there been no public road crossing, does not, I think, admit of doubt. If Buchlyvie Station had been at a distance from any level crossing, the making of this loop would have been a work incidental to the working of the line in accordance with Government requirements, and therefore a work "necessary" in the sense of section 16 of the Railways Clauses Act, and if "necessary" in the sense of section 16, then plainly not struck at by the cessation of powers clause in the special Act. It is not easy to imagine a situation to which the words "acts necessary" could more distinctly apply than to the fulfilment of an authoritative order of a Government department for the carrying out of rules fixed by public statute passed subsequently to the making of the line. The railway company in this case are not doing a work they desire to do at all, but a work which is forced upon them by a Government inspector under sanction that until it has been done other works ordered by him cannot be passed as sufficiently done to fulfil the requirements of the department under their statutory powers. Now, if the work could not be said to be beyond the powers of the company if executed entirely within the lands acquired by them for their line, can it be said to be beyond their powers when it is executed, not on their own land, but on a road which their statute gave them the power to use as part of their line, and within the limits of the breadth of the land allowed to be acquired for their line on either side of the road. I am unable so to hold. The company, having right to use this portion of the road by crossing it with their line, are entitled to such use within the limits of the lines shewn on their parliamentary plans as the "use of the railway" in the words of section 16 makes necessary. And the responsible official, whose duty it is to regulate certain matters, lays down as "necessary" to the future use of the line the extension of a loop, which as it happens cannot be completed without its being carried across the road. It would be strange if a line necessary for the use of the railway could not be carried across a road at which a level crossing had been authorised in the construction of the railway. If a level crossing is allowed by Act of Parliament, can there be any reason why the words "necessary use" of the line should not apply to that place as much as to any other part of the line? I do not see how there can be.

Of course there may be "acts necessary" to the use of a line, which, if carried out at a level crossing, might make such a change in the conditions that good reason might arise for coming to the conclusion that a level crossing should no longer be suffered to exist at that place. And it is quite possible that this may prove to be the case in the present instance. But such a contingency is amply provided for by the law. Level crossings are permitted by the Legislature when the existing circumstances at the time of the application for authority to make a line seem to make it safe and expedient to allow the line to cross roads in that manner. But if circumstances change, if traffic increases, or high speed traffic is developed, or any new circumstances arise which alter the case, then it is in the power of such a body as the pursuers in this case to apply to the Board of Trade to have an order made on the railway company to substitute a bridge for the level crossing. So in this case, if the establishment of this loop has any such effects as will justify an application for an order to have a bridge constructed, that order can be obtained. Meantime, the only question is whether the pursuers are entitled to the declarator and interdict which they ask for on the ground that the railway company have no power to execute the work declared necessary by the Board of Trade. I think that they are not, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and the action dismissed.

LORD YOUNG concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. In dealing with this case, I start with the consideration that what the defenders have done has been practically in obedience to an order by the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade, in exercise of a statutory power, called upon the defenders to interlock the whole stations upon their system for signalling purposes. The defenders having complied with this order at Buchlyvie Station, the officer of the Board of Trade refused to approve of or pass as sufficient what had there been done, unless the defenders executed the works now complained of. These works were accordingly carried out. In these circumstances it is presumable that the works complained of were necessary in the public interest, and that no public interest has been injured by their execution. The question remains, however, whether the works so executed were legally within the defenders' power. The complainers maintain that the respondents' operations were illegal and unwarrantable, notwithstanding the circumstances under which they were carried out, and whether they were so or not is the question before us. The Lord Ordinary has held that the defenders, in the works complained of, "exceeded their powers and acted illegally." I cannot concur in that opinion.

The railway was constructed under statutory authority, and the private Act which authorised it incorporated the Railway Clauses Act of 1845, section 16 of which enacts,—[His Lordship then read the portions of section 16 quoted above.] The section then provides for compensation being made for any damage that such works may occasion.

It appears to me that the operations complained of come within the authority I have just quoted. At the original construction of the line at Buchlyvie Station, only one line was carried across the public road on the level. Another line has now been added, but I think that is within the fair meaning of the statute as a substitution—the substitution, namely, of a double for a single line, just as much as the erection of the increased parcel office for a smaller one was held to be a substitution in the case of Emsley.[1] But supposing it to be doubtful that the work complained of is a substitution, it does not appear to me to be doubtful that it is a work and convenience similar to those authorised by the before-quoted section of the Act of 1845. Nor can it be doubted that the new accommodation work (for that is its character) is "an act necessary . . . for using the railway," for the Board of Trade has required it. I would be slow to interfere with what the railway company has done, seeing that the work has been ordered and executed in the public interest, and that the public interest has not and cannot suffer thereby. That the public interest—that is, the public safety and convenience—has not been injured appears from the fact that the two lines now laid across the road on the level are fenced and guarded just as the single line formerly was, and practically the public road has not been diminished, or made less serviceable by the laying of the second line. That such public interest will not suffer in the future is clear enough from this, that the Board of Trade, under the Act of 1863, can order the defenders to build a bridge under or over their level crossing if convinced that the public interest requires the adoption of such a measure. The pursuers, in fact, seem to be using this action as a compulsitor upon the defenders to build such a bridge. But no action is necessary for that purpose. They have only to satisfy the Board of Trade of the necessity or propriety of such a bridge in order to get it.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

Macdonald v. Macdougall.

Crofter—Right of crofter to take sea-ware—Right in question with singular successors—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 12.—Sec. 12 of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, enacts, inter alia, that "it shall be competent for the Crofters Commission to draw up a scheme regulating the use by crofters on the same estate of sea-weed, for the reasonable purposes of their holdings, peat bogs, and heather or grass, used for thatching purposes, and to include the charge for all these in the fixed rent."

In 1894 the proprietor of lands within a crofting parish sold part of these lands, and thereafter the purchaser brought an action against crofters on the remaining portion of the seller's lands praying to have the defenders interdicted from gathering sea-ware on the sea-shore ex adverso of the lands sold. In defence the crofters averred that from time immemorial they and their predecessors in the crofts had been in use and had right to gather sea-ware from the sea-shore in question, and that in 1887 their rents were fixed by the Crofters Commission on the footing that they had that right.

Held that the defenders were entitled to proof of their averments as to their right to gather sea-ware.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Inverness-shire.

IN February 1896 Alexander Macdonald of Balranald, in the parish of North Uist, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Lochmaddy against Donald Macdougall and others, praying the Court to interdict the defenders from "collecting or carrying away or interfering with any sea-ware, tangle, or other growth or substance which may be growing or thrown upon any part of the farms and lands of Balranald, Paiblesgarry, and Penimore, in the parish of North Uist and county of Inverness, belonging to and occupied by the pursuer, or upon the sea-shores ex adverso thereof; and secondly, from entering upon, passing through, or using any part of said farms and lands, or the roads or paths thereon, or the sea-shore ex adverso of said lands for the purpose of collecting, carrying away, or interfering with any such sea-ware, tangle, or others foresaid."

The following were the material averments of the pursuer and answers of the defenders:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is proprietor of the lands and estate of Balranald, extending along the sea-shore a distance of six miles, and comprehending the farms of Balranald, Paiblesgarry, and Penimore, in the parish of North Uist and county of Inverness, with the pertinents thereto belonging, having purchased the same from Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde of Kilmory and North Uist, Baronet, with entry at the term of Whitsunday 1894; and the defenders are crofters and cottars in the township of Knockantorran, on the estate of North Uist, belonging to the said Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde. The pursuer's said lands and estate form part of the barony of Macdonald, and he has, in virtue of his titles, sole and exclusive right to the sea-ware and tangle, whether growing or drifted, on the shores ex adverso of his lands." (Ans. 1.) "Admitted that the defenders are crofters and cottars in the township of Knockantorran, on the estate of North Uist, belonging to Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde. Quoad ultra denied, and pursuer is called upon to produce his titles in support of his averment."

(Cond. 2) "The township of Knockantorran is immediately to the south of, and adjoins the farm of Paiblesgarry, and the crofters and cottars of the township are in the habit every season of collecting sea-ware and tangle from the shores ex adverso of their township lands, for the purpose of manuring their arable lands. In like manner the pursuer, first as tenant, and afterwards as proprietor, of the farm of Paiblesgarry, has been in the habit from time immemorial of collecting sea-ware and tangle from the shores ex adverso of the lands of Paiblesgarry with a like object. The explanations and averments in the answer to this statement are denied. Explained that at one time, while the township of Knockantorran and the farm of Paiblesgarry belonged to the same proprietor, his factor, with the view of making the distribution of sea-ware as equal as possible, made an arrangement that the crofters of Knockantorran should be allowed to take a certain quantity of sea-ware from a part of the shore ex adverso of the farm of Paiblesgarry, while, on the other hand, the tenant of Paiblesgarry should be allowed to take sea-ware from a part of the sea-shore ex adverso of the townships' lands of Knockantorran and Balemore. This was merely a temporary arrangement affecting tenants on the same estate, and was brought to an end when the pursuer became proprietor of the estate of Balranald . . ." (Ans. 2) "Admitted under reference to answer 1 hereof. It is explained and averred that the defenders have from time immemorial, or at least for a period of over sixty years, been in the habit of collecting and removing sea-ware, tangle, and other substances from the shores ex adverso of the lands of Paiblesgarry, and as far north as that part of Balranald lands called Hunglam, for the purpose of manuring their arable lands, and for other purposes, to which, as tenants of the township lands of Knockantorran and otherwise, they had and have a joint right along with the tenant of the farm of Balranald; and, in like manner, the pursuer and his predecessors in the lands of Balranald have for a like period been in the habit of collecting and removing sea-ware, tangle, and other substances from the shore ex adverso of the lands of Knockantorran for similar purposes, in which they had and have a joint right along with the crofter defenders. Said joint rights of the pursuer and the crofter defenders have always existed in certain ancient and well-established and recognised shares in the sea-ware useful and necessary for manurial purposes. . . . They have an undoubted lawful joint right, along with the pursuer, to the sea-ware, tangles, and other substances cast on the said shore ex adverso of the lands of Balranald as stated, and have uninterruptedly exercised and enjoyed said right from time immemorial, and for at least over and beyond the last sixty years, without hindrance or molestation in any manner of way . . ."

(Cond. 3) "Immediately after Whitsunday 1894, and as part of the arrangement made between the pursuer and the said Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde, when the former purchased the estate of Balranald, the said Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde gave notice, through his local factor, of the sale of the said lands to the pursuer, and that the defenders would in future be only allowed to take sea-ware from the shores of their own farms. . . The averments in answer 3 are denied, in so far as they state that the defenders have any right whatever to the sea-ware and tangle cast ashore ex adverso of Paiblesgarry." . . (Ans. 3) "The notice referred to is referred to for its terms. Quoad ultra denied, and averred that, at the date of the alleged sale of the lands of Balranald from Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde to the pursuer, the crofter defenders were all crofters holding their lands under and in virtue of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, from the said Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde, and having an inalienable right to certain shares in the sea-ware and tangle cast on the shore ex adverso of Paiblesgarry on Balranald lands as far north as Hunglam, as parts and pertinents of their holdings, and they still hold their lands, and the right to gather, collect, and take away the drift sea-ware and tangle from ex adverso the shores of Paiblesgarry and Balranald, with right of access to the sea-shore there, across the lands of Paiblesgarry, by themselves or their servants, and with carts and horses, for exercising said right, and they cannot be deprived thereof so long as they continue tenants of their said holdings under said Act. It is also averred that, when having fair rents fixed for their holdings by the Crofters Commission in the year 1887, it was expressly stated to the Commissioners, and admitted as correct by Sir John William Powlett Campbell Orde, the then proprietor of both Balranald and Knockantorran lands, that the crofter defenders had the rights to sea-ware and tangle as here set forth on Paiblesgarry shore, and as far north as Hunglam on Balranald shore, as part of their holdings, and their rents were accordingly fixed on that footing, and still remain as then fixed. . . . It is averred that, without the right to the sea-ware and tangle in question, the holdings of the crofter defenders would be valueless."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer, having, as proprietor and occupier of the estate of Balranald, exclusive right to the sea-ware and tangle on the shores ex adverso of his lands, is entitled to interdict against the defenders.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defenders, having, from time immemorial, exercised the right of gathering, collecting, and carrying away the sea-ware, tangle, and other substances ex adverso of the lands of Paiblesgarry, on the estate of Balranald, as set forth, as a right attached to their holdings, and said right being vested in them in virtue of the provisions of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886,* they are entitled to continue the exercise thereof, and to use the roads or tracks across the lands of Paiblesgarry, on the estate of Balranald, in use to be used by them for that purpose.

On 22d April 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Webster) granted interdict against the cottar defenders; allowed the pursuer a proof of his averments, and to the crofter defenders a conjunct probation, and further allowed these defenders "a proof of their averments as to their rights as tenants of the township farm of Knockantorran to collect and carry away sea-ware, tangle, or other growth or substance of a sea-weed nature, which may be growing or thrown upon the lands of pursuer, and of entering or passing over said lands for these purposes, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation: Appoints said proof to take place on a day to be afterwards fixed."

On appeal the Sheriff (Ivory) on 28th May pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the defenders have not averred any relevant right to collect or carry away sea-ware or tangle from the lands of Balranald, Paiblesgarry, and Penimore, belonging to the pursuer, or from the sea-shore ex adverso thereof: Therefore interdicts the defenders," &c.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—They were entitled to prove that they had right to sea-ware at common law, and that the Commissioners, in fixing the rent, had taken the right to sea-ware into account.

Argued for the pursuer;—Under his titles the pursuer had an exclusive right to the sea-ware ex adverso of his lands,[1] and the defence founded on the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, was irrelevant. A right to take sea-ware was not part of a holding within the meaning of that Act,* and apart from special stipulation it was not part of a tenant's right at common law,[2] and in any case it was not binding against singular successors.[3] Section 12 did not apply. It dealt only with the enlargement of holdings, and the procedure for the enlargement of holdings had not been followed here.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The decision of both the Sheriffs is against the cottars, and I have no doubt that it is right. They are not under the Act. They may have privileges, but I do not think that these privileges are of such a character as to entitle them to a proof here.

The other defenders here aver that under an arrangement with their landlord they have a right to take sea-weed from the shore opposite the pursuer's land as long as their tenancy exists. Of course if they could be removed from their holdings their rights would expire. But under the Crofters Acts they have obtained fixity of tenure, and they cannot be turned out as long as they pay the rent fixed by the Crofters Commission. Now, in considering what rent to fix, it was part of the duty of the Crofters Commission, under section 12 of the Act of 1886, to deal with sea-ware to be used by crofters for the reasonable purposes of their holdings, and to include the charge for this in the fixed rent. It is quite obvious that if crofters are to be held entitled to get sea-ware for the reasonable purposes of their holdings, this question cannot be settled by merely saying that the sea-ware is not ex adverso of their holdings. Some holdings may not be opposite the sea at all, others may be so situated that the drift of the sea will not allow the sea-ware to settle upon the shore opposite the holding. It was in view of all this that section 12 was passed. The defenders aver that they have a right to the sea-ware, and that their rent is fixed on that footing. They are entitled to have this submitted to proof. I therefore think we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff and revert to that of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. At present, whatever may be the result after the evidence is taken, the case appears very clear. Sir John Orde was proprietor of the whole island, including Balranald and Knockantorran. In 1894 he sold Balranald to the pursuer Macdonald. Macdonald thereafter raised these proceedings before the Sheriff complaining of trespass by Sir John Orde's crofter tenants in Knockantorran, across the lands of Balranald, giving access to the sea-shore, and of their taking away the sea-ware ex adverso of these lands. If the pursuer establishes that trespass without right on the part of the defenders he will succeed, and interdict will be granted. But the alleged trespassers say that the right to take sea-ware ex adverso of these lands is a part of their croft, with reference to which their rents as crofters were fixed, and that this part of their croft cannot be taken away any more than any other. This is the dispute, and the Sheriff-substitute very properly allowed a proof, on the one hand to the pursuer to prove the trespass by shewing that the defenders were in use to take this sea-ware by permission of the proprietor—a permission which could be withdrawn—and on the other hand to the defenders to prove that what they did was really in exercise of their rights.

LORD TRAYNER.—Prima facie, the pursuer, by reason of his title, has the exclusive property of the sea-ware opposite his lands. But the defenders have averred—and this, I think, the Sheriff must have omitted to notice—that the right to take sea-ware from the shore opposite the pursuer's lands was a part of their holdings as crofters, and was regarded as such by the Crofters Commission in fixing their rents. If that is so, Mr Macdonald cannot take away any right which the Crofters Commission has held to be a part of the defenders' crofts, for statute has given to the crofters fixity of tenure. The pursuer and defenders being thus at variance in regard to material facts, this question falls to be decided by proof whether the right to take sea-ware from opposite the pursuer's land was given to the defenders by the former owner of the property and was taken into account by the Crofters Commission in fixing their rents.

LORD MONCREIFF was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor appealed against, . . . and remit the case back to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the proof in terms of his interlocutor of 22d April last, and decern."

Property—Common Interest—Servitude.—A was the proprietor of the ground floor of a tenement, of which B and C owned the upper flats. The titles of all were derived from a common author, and conferred upon each "the following servitude":—"That no buildings shall be erected on the area behind the said tenement nearer the back side wall thereof than nineteen feet, and that the said space of nineteen feet all along the length of the said tenement shall be kept open and unbuilt upon in all time coming, in order to preserve the back lights of the foresaid shops hereby disponed."

Expenses—Reduction of Sheriff Court Decree.—The defenders in a Sheriff Court action having obtained decree of absolvitor, with expenses, on 1st December, extracted the decree on 26th December, without waiting for approval of the Auditor's report on their account. The pursuers having brought an action for reduction of the Sheriff's interlocutor, in which they obtained a judgment in their favour in the Inner-House, the defenders submitted that they were entitled to the expenses of the proceedings in the Outer-House, in respect that these had been caused by the pursuers neglecting to appeal against the Sheriff's judgment within fourteen days, before the expiry of which extract could not have been obtained. The Court found the pursuers entitled only to expenses in the Sheriff Court and in the Inner-House.

1st Division. Lord Kincairney.

(SUPRA, May 21, 1896, p. 738.)

The trustees of the deceased William Taylor, jeweller, Glasgow, were the proprietors of a shop on the street floor at 64 Argyle Street, Glasgow, the property extending from front to back of the tenement. The first and second flats in the same tenement were owned by John M'Gavigan and James Carrick respectively. The different parties derived their rights under dispositions from a common author in 1803, the dispositions bearing to confer a right of servitude over a court or area at the back of the tenement. The clauses in the different titles were in effect the same. The title of Taylor's trustees contained a conveyance to "the following servitude over the ground and area to the north of the said tenement, viz., that no buildings shall be erected on the area behind the said tenement nearer the back side wall thereof than nineteen feet, and that the said space of nineteen feet all along the length of the said tenement shall be kept open and unbuilt upon in all time coming, in order to preserve the back lights of the foresaid shops hereby disponed."

For a number of years the upper flats had been used for business purposes, and a hoist had been provided for the raising and lowering of goods from the back area. This hoist consisted of a brick structure projecting outwards above the back window of the shop belonging to Taylor's trustees, and supported at one point by an iron column fixed in the ground. When Taylor acquired the ground floor in 1866, this projecting structure was closed at its base by an extension of the flooring of M'Gavigan's property, and the goods were raised and lowered by means of a block and tackle outside of the hoist. About the year 1883 alterations were made on the construction of the hoist by the proprietors of the upper flats. The base of the hoist was taken away, and a wooden upright was fitted at each of the four corners within the hoist for the guidance of a moveable cage, in which the goods were raised or lowered inside the hoist, instead of outside as formerly. These uprights were fixed in the back court. Two were placed close against the back wall of the shop belonging to Taylor's trustees, one on each side of the window of the back shop, and the other two at a distance of between four and five feet from the wall.

In 1893 Taylor's trustees raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against M'Gavigan and Carrick, concluding for declarator that, as proprietors of the shop, No. 64 Argyle Street, they "are in right of a real servitude attaching thereto, whereby they are entitled to have the court or area of ground, lying immediately to the back . . . of the back wall of the said shop . . . to the extent of nineteen feet . . . from said back wall, kept open and unbuilt upon in all time coming, in order to preserve the back lights of the said shop," and that the structure erected by the defenders ex adverso of the pursuers' back wall was a "contravention of the right and property of the pursuers in the said shop . . . and of the servitude right attaching thereto." The summons also concluded for the removal of the hoist so far as ex adverso of the pursuers' back wall, and for interdict.

The defenders denied that the alterations which they had made upon the hoist had injured the light of the pursuers' shop, or were in contravention of their rights.

After a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) found that the pursuer had "failed to prove that there has been any material interference with the servitude of light possessed by pursuer on the part of the defenders," and assoilzied the defenders.

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry), on 1st December 1894, adhered to the above interlocutor.

On 26th December the defenders, without having had the Auditor's reports on their accounts approved, extracted this decree.

Appeal being thus rendered impossible, the pursuers raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for reduction of the interlocutors pronounced in the Sheriff Court, and for decree of declarator, removal, and interdict in terms of the Sheriff Court process. The summons also contained other declaratory and prohibitory conclusions bearing on the rights of the parties in the back area, but it is unnecessary to advert to these in detail.

The pursuers repeated the averments and pleas stated by them in the Sheriff Court action, and narrated the proceedings therein.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—1. The action is incompetent. 2. The action is irrelevant. 3. Res judicata. 7. The defenders should be assoilzied in respect (1) the hoist complained of has been erected and used by them and their authors for the prescriptive period; (2) the alterations made in said hoist in 1883 did not in any way injuriously affect the pursuers' light; (3) the said alterations were acquiesced in by the pursuers.

On 9th August 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defenders, reserved consideration of their third plea, and appointed the cause to be enrolled for further procedure.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The defenders' first plea is that the action is incompetent. They maintained that the effect of section 64 of the Court of Session Act of 1868, which abolishes the process of advocation, and sections 65 and 66, which substitute a note of appeal, was by implication to supersede and abolish the process of reduction as a process of review of a Sheriff Court decree. They founded also on section 67, which makes appeal incompetent after the expiration of six months from the date of a final judgment, and also on the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, section 3, subsection 5, which provides for the finality of a Sheriff Court judgment in the case of an abandoned appeal.

"It may be admitted that a reduction is a very inconvenient process for reviewing a Sheriff Court decree, and I think that for a considerable time back such actions have not been common in practice. Still, of course, the defenders did not dispute that, prior to 1868, an action of reduction was a mode of taking a Sheriff Court judgment to review, just as distinctly recognised as an advocation, and there are several reported cases about such reductions, the chief question in such cases being whether it was competent to review by reduction an unextracted Sheriff Court decree; on which point, it may, I think, be said to have been determined that, in general, a reduction of a Sheriff Court decree which had not been extracted was incompetent (as decided in Buchanan v. Lumsden, 20th May 1837, 15 S. 958, and Scouller v. M'Lachlan, 29th March 1864, 2 Macph. 955); but that a reduction might be sustained if the decree was not extractable, as in Holmes v. Tassie, 19th January 1826, 6 S. 394, and Jack v. Umpherston, 11th March 1837, 15 S. 833.

"But the defenders contended that this was altered by the Act of 1868. They referred to Tennants v. Romanes, 22d June 1881, 8 R. 824, and Thomson v. King, 19th January 1883, 10 R. 469, which were cases in which appeals were disallowed as beyond the dates for appeal, and argued that such questions would have been idle if, after the time for appeal had expired, it was still competent to bring a reduction. I do not need to solve the question whether, after six months from the date of a final decree, and when it was protected by lapse of time from an appeal, it could be brought up by a reduction if it were extracted. I do not suggest any doubt about that, but no such question arises. And with regard to the general point raised by the defenders, I have no difficulty in repelling their argument, and in holding that the substitution of an appeal for an advocation has no effect or bearing on the process of reduction as a mode of review. There are no words in the statute to suggest that it was intended to affect reductions. A right of access to the Court of that kind cannot be taken away by implication, for which, indeed, I see no ground—Maclachlan v. Rutherford & Co., 10th June 1854, 16 D. 937; Marr & Sons v. Lindsay, 7th June 1881, 8 R. 784.

"Further, the competency of a reduction of Sheriff Court decrees has been recognised since the Court of Session Act, in the sense that no doubt has ever been cast on it. In M'Leod v. Collier, 9th November 1869, 42 Scot. Jurist, 62, Lord Ormidale decided that a reduction was competent in a case where a suspension might also have been competent. The competency of a reduction of an extracted Sheriff Court decree in the general case was recognised in Watt Brothers v. Foyn, 1st November 1879, 7 R. 126, although it was held that a Sheriff Court judgment final under the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, could not be reviewed in any form. In Weir v. Tudhope, 14th June 1892, 19 R. 858, no doubt was expressed as to the competency of a reduction, and in Mackenzie v. Munro, 10th November 1894, 22 R. 45, a Sheriff Court decree by default was reduced. The new Style Book retains a style of a reduction of a Sheriff Court decree on its merits—Juridical Styles, vol. iii. pp. 86, 87.

"I cannot therefore doubt that a reduction of an extracted final judgment of a Sheriff is still competent, although it may be true that it is now rarely met with in practice.

"The repetition in the conclusions of the summons of the prayer of the petition is no doubt competent and proper—Juridical Styles, vol. iii. (1828), p. 233, and recent Juridical Styles ut supra; and possibly it is necessary—Ramsay v. Bruce, 30th November 1849, 12 D. 243. So also I have no doubt of the competency of the conclusion for the expenses in the Sheriff Court. It is warranted by the Style Books and was contained in the summons of reduction in Bisset v. Anderson, 9th March 1849, 11 D. 1015, and Friend v. Skelton, 2d March 1855, 17 D. 548, to the Session papers of which cases I have been referred.

"The defenders further maintained that the Sheriff Court judgments must be reviewed and considered on the pleadings and proof led in the Sheriff Court, that the introduction of new conclusions and new averments was incompetent, and that there could be no further proof. The pursuers did not refer to any precedent for the form of summons which they have adopted. Even, however, if it should be held that these new conclusions could not be entertained, that would not make the action incompetent. But, as at present advised, I do not see why it should be incompetent to conclude in one summons that the Sheriff Court judgment should be set aside, and then that (they being removed out of the way) further declaratory findings should be pronounced in order to elucidate more clearly, if necessary, the rights of the parties. I think the form of process is competent, although it may not be convenient. I do not know whether any further proof is necessary in order that these conclusions may be dealt with, nor do I decide whether any proof ought to be allowed before the action is exhausted as a process of review. That will be for subsequent consideration. The defenders maintain that there was really nothing new in the additional conclusions and averments, and that these were only inserted in order to fortify the Sheriff Court case, for which purpose it was maintained they could not competently be used. This matter was not fully discussed, nor was the pursuers' demand for a proof precisely formulated; and I think I can do no more at present than decide that the action cannot be dismissed as incompetent. The conclusions of the summons are so verbose that it is not very easy to see what the new point is which is meant to be introduced. It seems to regard a sunk shop and sunk cellar not specially referred to in the Sheriff Court action.

"I am, on the grounds explained, of opinion that the defenders' first plea cannot be sustained. The second plea, that the action is irrelevant, seems out of place in defence to an action brought for the purpose of review. The third plea, res judicata, can only come into play if the decrees in the Sheriff Court be not reduced. It must in the meantime be reserved. The pursuers maintained that it should be repelled, on the ground that a decree in the Sheriff Court can never be pleaded as res judicata in the Court of Session, founding on a dictum by Erskine to that effect (E. 4, 3, 7). But having regard to the cases in note (b) in Mr Nicolson's ed., vol. ii. 1142, and also to ordinary practice, I am not prepared to act on that dictum and repel the plea of res judicata. If the Sheriff Court judgments be not res judicata, there would have been no necessity for bringing this reduction. . . ."

* "NOTE.—By interlocutor of 9th August 1895 I repelled the defenders' first plea that the action was incompetent, holding that in the circumstances the interlocutors in the Sheriff Court might be competently reviewed in an action of reduction, and indicating an opinion or impression that it was not incompetent to append additional conclusions, and to make averments applicable to these conclusions. At the beginning of the winter session the case was restored to the Procedure Roll, and parties have since been heard on the merits.

"I think that in further dealing with the case, I must first of all dispose of the conclusions of reduction,—that is to say, I must review the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff; and as the pursuers did not move for any additional proof—as might have been competent in order to the determination of the questions raised in the Sheriff Court—I must consider the judgments now submitted to review with reference to the record and proof in the Sheriff Court. . . .

On 25th January 1896 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of

"At the outset it is necessary to keep in view that the operations of which the pursuers complain are not new, independent operations, but are only modifications of a previous state of matters; and what the pursuers require to shew is, not that the hoist to which they object, as it is used, is contrary to their rights and productive of injury, but that the change which the defenders effected in 1883 is illegal and injurious.

"For a long time before 1883 the defenders and their authors were in the habit of taking their goods into their warehouses by the back windows. They did so by means of a hoist, not extending downwards below the floor of their flats, but supported on an iron pillar resting on the area or court at the street level, and by a block and tackle by which the goods were lifted from the court. This block and tackle projected about five feet from the back wall, but when the defenders' goods were raised by it they passed the back window of the pursuers' shop, temporarily obscuring it to a slight degree as they passed. The defenders say that this method of using the court and their back windows had continued for forty years, but the precise period does not signify in this case, seeing that the right of the defenders to convey their goods to their warehouses in that manner is not challenged. What was the nature of the right which the defenders thus enjoyed? It was a right of ish and entry to their warehouses by the court and by the windows, and just as clearly a right of ish and entry as if the entry had been a door. They made use of this entry without any objection by the owner or owners of the court, and, as must be held, with their tacit acquiescence, and what the defenders did in 1883 was to modify and make more convenient for themselves their mode of exercising their right of entry by their windows. To effect this a two-fold operation was required, the erection of four posts fixed in the court, and the adjustment within the four posts of a cage in which the goods might be raised. The cage, however, in this case passed close by the back wall and by the window of the pursuers' back shop, whereas formerly the bales of goods passed at a distance of five feet from the window.

"This alteration is the whole subject-matter of the complaint by the pursuers in the Sheriff Court. The case must be viewed on the assumption that the defenders had a right to carry their bales of goods past the pursuers' window in conformity with their former practice. If that were not so, the question would have been totally different. The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute are of opinion that this modification on the defenders' mode of entry does the pursuers no material injury, and I am not prepared to dissent from that opinion. The pursuers represent that the cage may be put to a use which may affect them materially; as, for instance, if the defenders should allow the cage to rest for a period of time against their window. The defenders might have subjected them to a similar annoyance, although certainly less in degree, when they used their block and tackle. But if that should happen the question will arise whether the pursuers cannot prevent an unfair and unreasonable use of the hoist, and nothing in this judgment will prejudice that question.

"The pursuers further say that the four posts with the cage inside is a building, and is in breach of the servitude over the space of nineteen feet from their back wall conferred by their titles. Now, I agree in the opinion of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute that the interference of these posts with the access of light to the pursuers' shop is infinitesimal and immaterial the cause, and having heard parties on the motion of the pursuers for a proof of their averments in support of the conclusions of the summons additional to or other than the conclusions of the petition in the Sheriff Court, sustains the plea of res judicata as against the conclusions of the summons, so far as founded on the pursuers' right of servitude over the back court or area mentioned on record as proprietors of the dominant tenement, and finds that, in so far as the conclusions of the summons against the defenders, and in reference to the operations complained of, are based on a different medium concludendi, they are not supported thereby: Therefore refuses the pursuers' said motion, and assoilzies the defenders from the whole conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, of which allows an account to be given in, and remits it when lodged to the Auditor of Court to tax and to report: Reserving as to modification."

On 7th March the Lord Ordinary approved of the Auditor's report on the defenders' account of expenses, found that the taxed amount was £77, 15s. 9d., modified the same to £67, 5s. 9d., and decerned against the pursuers for payment of that amount.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the defenders having objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, their objection was repelled.—Supra, p. 738.

Argued for the pursuers;—The parties had a right of common interest in the back court, and neither party was entitled to interfere in any degree with the right of the other.[1] The case was not the same as if the question had been between a servient and a dominant owner, as in Russell and Boswell.[2] In such cases there was a presumption of freedom in favour of the proprietary rights of the servient owner; but the defender had no right of property in the back court, and the pursuer had an absolute right to insist that he should leave the back court unbuilt upon within the prescribed limits. While the right was given "in order to" preserve the back lights, the declaration of the purpose was not, as in the case of Russell,[2] so expressed as to imply any limitation on the right conferred. It was not legitimate, therefore, to consider, as the Lord Ordinary and Sheriffs had done, the amount of the injury sustained by the pursuers. But as matter of fact the structure erected in 1883 materially diminished the light of the pursuers' back shop.

Argued for the defenders;—The pursuers having no right of property in the court, but merely a right of servitude, could not complain

There is no evidence that it has ever necessitated more frequent use of artificial light. On the question whether these four posts with the cage inside ought to be regarded as a building, no authority affording any assistance was quoted. But holding that a clause imposing a servitude must be construed strictly, and in dubio in favour of freedom, I am of opinion that they did not constitute a building in the sense of the clause in the titles. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the pursuers have failed to shew that the interlocutors in the Sheriff Court are erroneous on the merits.

"Entertaining these views, I do not require to consider the defenders' plea of acquiescence, but I doubt whether the proof is sufficient to support it. . . ."

unless the defenders' operations materially interfered with and prejudiced the enjoyment of that right.[1] The prohibition against building was for the sole purpose of preserving light, and therefore unless the injury to light was material, the pursuers had no ground of action.[2] This view of the law was supported by the case of Stewart, Pott, & Company,[3] for the ground of decision there was that the operations of the defenders materially obstructed the pursuers' right of ish and entry. The defenders had a prescriptive right of ish and entry for goods to their back windows, and the pursuers' author had purchased his property in the knowledge that this right existed. No material alteration had been made on the mode in which that right was exercised, and the pursuers could not now object to its being exercised.[4]

LORD PRESIDENT.—There has been a great deal of procedure in this case, and the question at issue has to a large extent been obscured by the artificial way in which the questions have been raised. But turning to the rights of the parties, I look at the title of the two litigants. Now, so far as the ground or area behind their houses is concerned, the rights of the pursuers and defenders are identical. They are neither of them proprietors of this back court or area, but they both have interests therein, and substantially the same interests are defined in the two sets of titles. The main point to be attended to is that, on the face of both their titles, the space of nineteen feet all along the length of the tenement is to be kept open and unbuilt on in all time coming, in order to preserve the back lights. Now, down to 1883 the court—by which I mean the surface of the court—was certainly open and unbuilt upon. The operations now complained of make it impossible for anyone to say that the court is open in the part where this structure has been erected. That part of the court is not now open, but is enclosed; and it was admitted that suppose anyone desired to go right up to the pursuers' window he could not do so, because he would be encountered by this wooden erection.

Now, it seems to me that that is the turning point of the case. The person who has erected this structure has, as I have said, no rights of property in the court, and accordingly this is not a case where there is a presumption in favour of a proprietor having a free use of his property against one who is a servitude holder, both the litigants being servitude holders. Accordingly, it seems to me that the principle upon which the case must be decided is that laid down in Bennet v. Playfair,[5] which I think is very much in point; for there the Court, treating the rights of parties, which were, as in this case, the same, described them as rights of common interest or servitude, and held that neither party had a right to interfere with the enjoyment of the other.

Now, as I have pointed out, the result of the encroachments is that this part of the court has ceased to be open. It must also be observed, though I think this is not essential, that the wooden supports necessarily—though to a small extent—interfere with the light of the pursuers' window. Accordingly, I think the pursuers are entitled to have the structure removed. To summarise, it is put up by a person having no right to do so, it interferes with the openness of the court, and to a corresponding extent it is an invasion of the rights of the pursuers as appearing on their title.

How to apply that view of the rights of parties to the present case is a little difficult, but, first, the interlocutors in the Sheriff Court must be swept aside, because though the case was nominally presented to the Sheriff Court as one of servitude, yet the Sheriff was asked to order the removal of the structure, and so I do not think we could leave that series of judgments standing by which he has refused to do so. Then, as regards the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors, I think they must all go, and the remedy of the pursuer would seem to be a declarator, an order for removal, and an interdict confined entirely to the structure below, which gives rise to the suit.

LORD ADAM.—(After narrating the titles of the parties and the facts as given above, his Lordship proceeded)—The first observation I have to make is that it appears to me that the change which took place in 1883 was a very material one, having this element in it, that whereas prior to that date there was no erection whatever on the area of this ground, subsequently there has been this permanent structure. That change accordingly makes it impossible to say that since 1883 the defenders have been exercising a right previously existing. Now, I am willing to treat the case on the ground that there is no distinction between what has been called the sunk area and the rest of the area behind the tenement, but that they are all to be considered as composing the area described in the titles. We must observe, however, in the first place that this is not a question between the proprietor of the area and someone having a servitude right. The rights of the two parties are identical, and the right of the defenders to set up this structure—if such right there be—is merely one of usage.

But in the next place I think that whether we were dealing here with different proprietors or not the result would be the same, because it is a condition of the title granted to the pursuer that no building should be erected within nineteen feet of this tenement.

It is said that there is a difference, because there is inserted the reason for this stipulation, viz., "in order to preserve the back lights of the foresaid shops." But that does not appear to me to limit in any way the absolute right and obligation to keep the back area open for the space of nineteen feet. I think the obligation is quite a different one from that in the case of Russell v. Cowpar,[1] where the words used were "so as to," and it was held that if the erection were such as not to interfere with the lights of the dominant tenement, the obligation in the titles was fulfilled.

Accordingly, I think on this ground that no question arises here as to whether the defenders' operations materially interfere with the pursuers' rights. If that be so there is, I think, an end of the case, for the fact that the pursuer has allowed the structure to remain for twelve years is nothing more than sufferance and non-interference, and does not make it too late, when the question is raised by a person having the right to do so, to have the structure removed.

[1] 9 R. 660.

No. 181.

LORD M'LAREN.—It may be that the matter of which the pursuers complain resolves itself into a small interference with their comfort or legal rights, but in justice to them it must be observed that they raised the question before the Sheriff, who has jurisdiction either under 1 and 2 Vict. if it is treated as one of servitude, or under the Sheriff Court Act of 1877 if it is one of heritable right of less value than £1000. It is in consequence of the views successfully maintained by the defenders before the Sheriff and the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers have been under the necessity of coming here.

The infringement of right of which they complain arises from the fact that under their title, and that of the defenders, which flow from a common author, they each have equal rights to a back court or area, through which they have access to their respective storeys, and in which they have a certain interest reserved by the title.

Now, on a fair construction of these titles, it seems to me that the proprietor had parted with all his substantial interests in the area, reserving only a naked right of property, and that he gave equal rights to the different persons in the titles flowing from him, which are carefully defined. It is provided that a certain space shall be kept open and unbuilt upon in all time coming, "in order to preserve the back lights." Now the specification of a reason for the obligation does not in my judgment detract from its generality. Therefore it seems plain that the proprietor could not consistently with these rights put up any structure whatever, temporary or permanent, on this area, nor could he give a right to do so to any of his feuars. But the case for the defenders does not rest on any right which they purport to have received from the original owner, nor is it a case of setting up any superior or older title. Their right in the common property is identical with that of the pursuers. I think that in all cases of equal rights any one of the community is entitled to maintain the existing state of possession as against all the others. It is said that the right claimed by the defenders had begun in a lesser right of use—i.e., of raising goods by means of a block and tackle—which had been unchallenged for so long as to deprive the other feuars of their right of interference. That may be so, but then any right which the defenders acquired was nothing more than a right to put forward a plea of bar against others seeking to interfere with them, and such a plea can never be extended, as I think, beyond the original use. The conversion of this simple expedient into a regular mechanical lift occupying a definite space, and at times blocking up the window, seems to me to be a distinct extension of the use, and it is impossible for them to justify it consistently with the rights of the other owners of the joint servitude over the Court.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The defenders moved for expenses in the Outer-House (with the exception of the expenses of the discussion on the competency of the action), on the ground that these expenses had been caused by the fault of the pursuers in neglecting to appeal within fourteen days against the Sheriff's judgment on the merits.[1]

The pursuers moved for expenses in all the Courts, and argued;—There had been no fault on the part of the pursuers in not appealing before fourteen days had elapsed, for they had no reason to anticipate that the defenders would take the step of obtaining extract, which could afford them no benefit. It was quite within the competency of the Court to find the pursuers entitled to expenses in the Sheriff Court.[2]

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the reclaiming note for the pursuers against the interlocutors of Lord Kincairney, dated 8th and 25th January and 7th March 1896, recall the said interlocutors; reduce, declare, and decern, in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Find and declare that neither of the defenders has any right or title to erect a hoist, or to erect guide-posts or other connections for the hoist mentioned in the summons, upon the top of the sunk area or upon any part of the back court on the street level mentioned in the summons, and below the level of the original basement-floor of said hoist as it existed prior to the year 1883, or to attach any such posts or other connections to the back wall of the pursuers' property, saving only the bearing iron column or pillar excepted in the summons: Ordain the defenders, at their own expense, forthwith to take down and remove so much of the said guide-posts and other connections as are contiguous to or ex adverso of any part of the said back wall, and are below the said original basement-floor of said hoist, saving the said bearing iron column or pillar: Interdict, prohibit, and discharge the defenders from hereafter placing any erection or structure of whatever kind upon the top of the said sunk area, or upon any part of the said back court, on the street level contiguous to or ex adverso of the said back wall and below the level of the said original basement-floor, and from attaching guide-posts or other structures to the said back wall: Find the defenders conjunctly and severally liable to the pursuers in the expenses incurred in the Sheriff Court and in the Inner-House: Appoint accounts thereof to be lodged, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and to report, and quoad ultra find no expenses due to or by either party, and decern."

1st Division.

(Supra, Feb. 25, 1896, p. 534.)

This was an action of damages for slander, in which the Court adjusted issues on 25th February 1896. (Vide supra, p. 534.)

On 26th June the defender moved the Court to ordain the pursuer to find caution for expenses as a condition of being allowed to proceed. He stated that the pursuer, after incurring debts of a substantial amount in Glasgow, had gone away from that city without leaving any address.

No appearance was made for the pursuer.

The Court ordered intimation of the motion to be made to the pursuer.

Intimation was accordingly made by registered letters directed to the pursuer's last known address, but these were returned unopened.

On 3d July the defender repeated his motion.

Lord President.—The pursuer is an undischarged English bankrupt, and the question is whether he should be allowed to proceed in the action without finding caution. It is necessary for the determination of that question to consider the circumstances of the case and the nature of the action. On a recent occasion we had to give careful consideration to the quality of this action of damages for slander, and we were not favourably impressed with its bona fides as intended for the vindication of the pursuer's character from the charges which had been made against him. Taking advantage of his technical right to sue on certain isolated charges, he did not face up to the real attack made upon his character. I mention this in consequence of our obligation to consider the nature of the pursuer's claims in his action. We are also aware of the recent occasions when, on questions as to the time for trying this action, the pursuer has evinced no eagerness to meet the jury. We are now told that he has left Glasgow in debt, and without leaving an address.

Accordingly, in the whole circumstances, I think this is a case in which we should ordain the pursuer to find caution within eight days.

Lord Adam, Lord M'Laren, and Lord Kinnear concurred.

The Court ordained the pursuer to find caution within eight days.

Lord Saltoun v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

1st Division.
Dean of Guild Court, Edinburgh.

LORD SALTOUN AND OTHERS, trustees for the Supreme Council for Scotland of the 33d and last Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, applied to the Dean of Guild of Edinburgh for a warrant to construct a room over a portion of the flat roof of a building at the back of No. 74 Queen Street, of which they were proprietors.

In terms of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police (Amendment) Act, 1891, section 49, the plans were remitted to the Burgh Engineer, who returned them with this indorsation,—"The place is already sufficiently built on, having regard to the light and ventilation of existing buildings."

In the course of the proceedings the Burgh Engineer, on behalf of the Magistrates and Council, objected verbally to the petition being granted, on the ground previously stated.

On 11th June 1896 the Dean of Guild, after visiting the ground, refused the petition, on the ground that all the existing open space was required for the proper lighting and ventilation of the premises.

The petitioners having appealed to the First Division, answers to the petition were tendered by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council, in which they maintained that the appeal should be dismissed, on the grounds that the proposed addition would have the effect of seriously diminishing the light and ventilation of the street tenement, and that the question of what open space was required for lighting and ventilation was one for the discretion of the Dean of Guild.

The petitioners objected to the answers being received, and argued;—The answers should have been tendered in the Dean of Guild Court, and should not be received now. In any view, if the answers were allowed to be put in, the case should be remitted to the Dean of Guild Court, for if a record were made up in the Court of Session and the case tried there unnecessary expense would be laid upon the petitioners.

Argued for the respondents;—The course which had been followed was convenient. It was not for the public interest to add to the formal procedure in the Dean of Guild Court, and in many cases it was unnecessary that a record should be made up there. The course here followed was according to practice.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I should be sorry to do anything to impose upon the town expense and trouble to add to the formal procedure in Dean of Guild applications, and probably in the greater number of cases it is unnecessary. But we must consider the rights of proprietors, and according to the shewing of the town what has been done here is that the town having an answer to the application in the Dean of Guild Court withholds it, and the opposite party comes to this Court. If we order a record to be made up here two very undesirable things will happen,—first, we will not have the advantage of a judgment from the Dean of Guild on the question raised by the answers; and second, because the town has thought fit to withhold its answer, its opponent will have to pay the expense of a Court of Session litigation. I am against arriving at a conclusion which involves either of these results. I think the proper course is to allow the answers to be received, and to remit them, with the case, to the Dean of Guild.

Lord Saltoun v. Magistrates of Edinburgh.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

The Dean of Guild has both administrative and judicial functions, and I can quite understand that in the vast majority of applications the town or the opposite party is entitled to rely on the knowledge of the Dean of Guild, assisted if necessary by the advice of the Burgh Engineer, properly disposing of them, and that it is quite unnecessary for either party to interfere. But that is not the course which has been followed here, because we are informed by counsel for the town that the town did object to the application being granted at the first. If that is so, I agree that it is not fair that the town, having a case to submit, should in the first instance lie by and take the chance of the decision of the Dean of Guild being in their favour, and should not come forward to state their answer to the application until the other party has been obliged to come here.

I agree that we should allow the answers, and I think further that in this class of case we are entitled to have the judgment of the Dean of Guild, and to review it, and that the parties should not come here in the first instance. I asked whether the questions raised could be tried in the Dean of Guild Court, or whether the case was such as would from its nature come back to us, and I was informed that it was not a case of the latter kind.

On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN.—I should have been content, having regard to the practice of the other Division, to hear this case on the petition and answers as stated, and if a practical question were found to exist, then to remit it for the decision of the Dean of Guild. But the question of making up a record is a matter for the discretion of the Court, and no doubt the course approved by your Lordships is a convenient one to adopt, and will not have the effect of preventing the parties from hereafter obtaining a judgment of this Court on the construction of the statute.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur. The considerations that have weighed with me are, first, that the answers, as we have been informed by the counsel for the respondents, raise questions for the judicial determination of the Dean of Guild, and within his jurisdiction, so that after the decision in the Court of first instance the case, if it comes here at all, will come only for review; and secondly, that the counsel for the magistrates informs us that the objections taken in the answers were intended to be taken at the original proceedings, and that the respondents appeared and verbally opposed the petition on these very grounds. But I must observe that this verbal opposition does not appear to have been made known to the other party. Accordingly, the magistrates represent themselves as having obtained a judgment on questions which they have abstained from raising in any formal manner until they come to this Court. I agree that this is not a convenient course of procedure, nor altogether fair to the petitioners. The petitioners are entitled to have the Dean of Guild's judgment upon the questions that are raised on the answers, and we on the other hand ought to be informed with more certainty than we are at present whether the deliverance submitted to review was or was not a judgment pronounced after hearing parties.

THE COURT allowed the answers to be received, remitted the cause to the Dean of Guild to proceed as should be just, and found the respondents liable in expenses in the Court of Session.

Bannerman v. Bannerman's Trustee.

Trust—Charitable Bequest—Church—Conditional Bequest—Forfeiture.—A testatrix, who died in 1876, by a settlement, dated in 1875, directed her trustees to set apart the sum of £3000, and to pay the interest arising therefrom to the incumbent for the time being of St James's Episcopal Church, Aberdeen, "so long as the congregation worshipping in said church shall not be united to, or in connection with, the Scottish Episcopal Church." She further declared that in the event, inter alia, of the congregation at any time "uniting or being in connection with" the Scottish Episcopal Church, the trustees should be bound to pay over the £3000 among her residuary legatees.

In an action raised by the residuary legatees in 1895 for declarator that the legacy had become payable to them, on the ground that St James's Church was in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church, the following facts were proved:—

St James's Church was constituted in 1854. By the deed of constitution it was provided,—"The cure of the said St James's Church shall be held as aforesaid by clergymen having the orders of the said United Church of England and Ireland, and by such only."

The "English Episcopal" congregations in Scotland, of which St James's was one, kept themselves apart from the Scottish Episcopal Church and its bishops. As they had no bishop of their own, candidates for church membership, after being prepared by their own pastor, either went to England and were confirmed by a bishop there, or were admitted to the communion without confirmation.

In 1871, when the incumbency was vacant, a majority of the St James's congregation passed a resolution requiring the future ministers to take a licence from the Bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church in Aberdeen. The testatrix, and other members in the minority, lodged a notarial protest against this resolution being carried out, and it was abandoned.

In the beginning of 1877 arrangements were made by St James's Church, along with the other English Episcopal congregations in Scotland, to obtain the services of Bishop Beckles, a retired colonial bishop, but, in April 1877, the Convocations of Canterbury and York censured Bishop Beckles for intruding into the dioceses of bishops of the Scottish Episcopal Church without the consent of the bishop of the diocese, that church being in full communion with the Church of England. In consequence of this censure, the incumbent of St James's refused to present candidates for confirmation to Bishop Beckles, and the congregation approved of his action.

The incumbent then, on his own responsibility, applied for and obtained a licence from the Bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church at Aberdeen, the incumbent at the same time signing the Canons of that Church. No objection was taken by the congregation, and each subsequent incumbent took a licence from the bishop. The incumbent at the date of the action held a licence "to perform all the duties competent to his order in the Church of St James and the district attached thereto in our diocese." During his incumbency intimations were made to the congregation of confirmations to be held by the bishop, and candidates from St James's were confirmed by him, not in St James's Church itself, but in various Scottish Episcopal churches in Aberdeen. Collections for the mission and education funds of the Scottish Episcopal Church were intimated to and made by the congregation.

No change was made in the constitution of St James's Church, and the congregation, as a congregation, entered into no agreement with the bishop.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy, diss. Lord M'Laren) granted decree, holding that no overt act on the part of the congregation as such was necessary to create a connection in the sense of the trust-deed, and that such a connection was instructed by the facts proved, and in particular by the fact that the incumbents openly and in the knowledge of the congregation accepted the licence of the Scottish Episcopal Bishop of Aberdeen, and presented to him candidates for confirmation, thereby obtaining for themselves and the congregation many of the benefits arising from a connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church.

Miss Georgina Bannerman, Aberdeen, died in February 1876, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 12th November 1875, by which she conveyed her whole estates to trustees for certain purposes. The third purpose was as follows:—"I direct my trustees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death, to set apart the sum of three thousand pounds sterling, to be retained and invested by my said trustees in their own names as a capital sum, . . . and the interest and annual profits arising therefrom shall be paid and made over by them, yearly or half-yearly, to the incumbent for the time being of St James's Episcopal Church, in Aberdeen, for the purpose of augmenting his stipend, but that only so long as he continues to discharge the duties of incumbent to the satisfaction of my trustees, and so long as the congregation worshipping in said church shall not be united to, or in connection with, the Scottish Episcopal Church, and so long as the services and mode of worship in St James's Church shall be conducted in a manner which, in the opinion of my trustees, shall be strictly evangelical, and devoid of all practices of a ritualistic description, such as are in use among the party in the Church of England known as the High Church party, declaring that in any of the following events, viz., first, the congregation worshipping in said church at any time uniting or being in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church; or second, my said trustees being of opinion, and recording that opinion in writing, either that the incumbent has failed to discharge his said duties to their satisfaction, or that the service has been, or is being, conducted in a manner not strictly evangelical, and not devoid of such ritualistic practices—on all which questions my trustees shall be the sole judges, and their opinion final—then and in any of these events the said capital shall no longer be held by them for any purpose connected with the said church; and my trustees shall be bound, and they are hereby directed, forthwith to pay over and divide the same among those of my residuary legatees hereinafter specified, or such of them as shall be alive at the time of any of the events hereinbefore provided for, occurring to forfeit the interest of the said incumbent in said provision of three thousand pounds."

In 1895 General William Bannerman, C.B., and others, the residuary legatees of the testatrix, raised an action against (1) John Otto Macqueen, the sole acting trustee; (2) Rev. Angus M. Mackay, the incumbent for the time of St James's Church; and (3) W. K. Glover and others, the managers of the congregation worshipping in St James's, concluding for declarator that the bequest of £3000 had lapsed and fallen into residue, and that Mr Macqueen was bound forthwith to divide it among the pursuers as Miss Bannerman's residuary legatees, and for payment by the trustee.

The pursuers averred that Miss Bannerman was a member of St James's English Episcopal Church, and that during her life it had no connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church. (Cond. 7) "The said church and the congregation worshipping therein have become, and are now, united to, or at least in connection with, the Scottish Episcopal Church. . . ."

The pursuers pleaded;—The congregation worshipping in St James's Episcopal Church in Aberdeen having become united to, or at all events in connection with, the Scottish Episcopal Church, or Episcopal Church in Scotland, and Miss Bannerman's bequest mentioned in the summons having been thereby forfeited, the pursuers, as residuary legatees of Miss Bannerman, are entitled to have decree, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

All the defenders lodged defences.

The defender the Reverend A. M. Mackay, and the defenders W. K. Glover and others, denied that the congregation was united to or in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church. In answer 14, the defenders Glover and others stated,—"The congregation of St James's has never taken the necessary steps required by" the code of Canons of the Episcopal Church in Scotland "to become connected or united as a congregation with the Scottish Episcopal Church, and it does not now fulfil the requirements of said canons as a congregation of the said Church. Under the provisions of said code—(a) There is a regular form to be gone through when it is desired to admit a congregation into connection with the Episcopal Church in Scotland, including a formal application to the bishop. No such application has ever been made by the congregation of St James's Church. . . . (b) The incumbent of every congregation . . . has to be presented to the bishop by the patrons by means of a regular deed of presentation, and instituted by the bishop by means of another formal deed (Canon xiii. and Appendices xiv., xvii.). The incumbents of St James's . . . have been elected without any consultation with, or recognition of, the bishop, and were neither 'presented' to the bishop nor 'instituted' by him. (c) Every congregation . . . is required to elect a lay-elector, who takes part in the election of the bishop (Canon iv.), and on failure to do this, is formally required to do so by the bishop (Appendix ix.). The congregation of St James's Church has never elected a lay-elector, nor can it be required to do so. (d) Every congregation . . . must be formally 'visited' by the bishop once in three years (Canon viii. 2). The Bishop of Aberdeen has never paid St James's Church such a visitation, nor put forward any claim to do so. (e) Every Episcopal church in Scotland is required to deposit its title-deeds, &c., with the diocesan registrar. The congregation of St James's Church has never recognised any such official, nor any obligation to deposit its title-deeds, &c., with the diocesan registrar. (f) Every Episcopal church in Scotland now elects a lay representative to act on the Representative Church Council. No lay representative has ever been elected by St James's. . . . (g) The congregation of St James's Church has never been represented on the Diocesan Council of the Diocese of Aberdeen, or the Representative Church Council, or in any Synod of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. The Church of St James's has never subscribed to the clergy fund or any private fund of the Episcopal Church in

No. 184. July 4, 1896. Bannerman v. Bannerman's Trustee.

Scotland, nor has it claimed or received any grants from the funds of said Church such as it would have been entitled to if united or connected with it." These averments were not denied.

A proof was allowed.

The following facts were admitted or proved:—

In 1854 certain members of St Paul's Episcopal Church in Aberdeen, which was one of the churches known in Scotland as English Episcopal Churches, and had no connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church, resolved to establish another English Episcopal congregation in Aberdeen. A church was subsequently acquired, and named St James's English Episcopal Church.

The deed of constitution contained, inter alia, the following provisions:—"The said St James's Church, with the pertinents, shall be used solely and exclusively as and for a church for divine service and the ministration of sacred ordinances, in strict conformity with the articles of the United Church of England and Ireland, as by law established, and ritual conform thereunto, as the same have been heretofore followed and observed by the said United Church, and none other, and especially excluding and prohibiting all innovations by individuals or sects, the cure of which St James's Church shall be held by clergymen only having the orders of the said United Church of England and Ireland. . . . The whole temporal affairs of the church and congregation as herein enumerated shall be conducted by two several bodies of members of the congregation, called 'constituent members' and 'managers' respectively. . . . The cure of the said St James's Church shall be held as aforesaid by clergymen having the orders of the said United Church of England and Ireland, and by such only. No clergyman shall be elected for a longer period than three years, but a clergyman may be re-elected. . . . The constituent members shall have power to elect clergymen, to fix the stipend, &c., and they shall have a right of control over the actings of the managers. . . . The clergyman shall be bound, on the requisition of three-fourths in number of the whole constituent members and others entitled to vote in the election of a clergyman, as aforesaid, for the time to resign the cure of the church on receiving six months' salary from the date of the requisition."

From 1854 down to 1870 the congregation and the incumbent were entirely independent of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and in no way recognised the authority of the Bishop at Aberdeen. The incumbent held no licence from the bishop. Candidates for church membership were prepared and admitted without confirmation.*

At a meeting of the constituent members of the church held on 28th September 1870 it was stated that at a conference with Bishop Suther, the bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church at Aberdeen, he had agreed "to grant his licence to future clergymen of St James's Church without its being necessary for St James's to join the Scotch Episcopal Church," and a motion "that the meeting resolve to accept the concession which Bishop Suther had consented to grant, and that the clergyman accepting the cure of St James's Church be required to apply to the bishop of the diocese for his licence," was carried by a majority.

A notarial protest against this resolution being carried out was lodged by fifteen members of the church, including Miss Bannerman, and in consequence eight of the nine managers resigned office, and the bishop's licence was not applied for during Miss Bannerman's lifetime.

In the beginning of 1877 (the year after Miss Bannerman died) an association was formed, entitled "The Association of English Episcopalians in Scotland," with the object, inter alia, of obtaining a colonial or other bishop who would act as bishop of the English Episcopalians in Scotland. Accordingly an arrangement was entered into with Bishop Beckles, who had formerly been Bishop of Sierra Leone, and now had a living in London, under which that bishop agreed to come to Scotland and administer the rite of confirmation to candidates from the different congregations of the English Episcopal Church.

In April 1877, however, the Convocations of York and Canterbury passed resolutions censuring the "intrusion" by Bishop Beckles into the dioceses of the Scottish Episcopalian Bishops, their Church being in full communion with the Church of England.

In consequence of these resolutions, Mr Allen, then incumbent of St James's, refused to present candidates for confirmation to Bishop Beckles, and St James's Church approved of this course, and withdrew from the association.

On 7th May 1877 Mr Allen addressed the following letter to the congregation of St James's:—"Circumstances have arisen which make it becoming in me to address a few lines to you at the present time.

"It was purposed some time ago that Bishop Beckles should hold a confirmation in S. James's, but a vote of censure having been, all but unanimously, passed upon him, for his conduct in Scotland, by both Convocations of the Church of England, it became my duty to decline to present candidates to him for confirmation. To do otherwise would, I felt, be only placing myself and my congregation in a position of antagonism to the English Church, of which we claim to be members—would be dishonouring S. James's by bringing it into connection with a bishop resting under the gravest of church censures—and would be an injury to the candidates and their friends.

"I need not say that it was a matter of satisfaction to me when the constituent members, on last Wednesday evening, shewed their approbation of my conduct by passing a vote of thanks to me by a majority of 19 votes to 12.

"But it could scarcely have escaped your notice, as it did not escape mine, that the unanimous sentiment of all parties in the Church of England, of Evangelicals and High-churchmen alike (for the question was not one of party) having been declared in convocation, in reference to Bishop Beckles, the position of all English clergymen ministering in English Episcopalian churches in Scotland was quite altered from what it had been before. Before the censure was passed on Bishop Beckles their position was, at least, silently tolerated in the English Church, but afterwards it was openly and authoritatively condemned. For my own part, I felt assured that the congregation of S. James would not (especially when time should allow these things to be fully understood) be content that their minister should rest under the censure of his Church. I am a clergyman of the English Church, and I know you would not wish me to be other than a loyal one. It is, therefore, with perfect confidence on your sympathy that I take this, the earliest opportunity, of informing you that I have, in obedience to the declared will of our common Mother Church, sought and obtained the licence of the Bishop of Aberdeen.

Bannerman v. Bannerman's Trustee.

"I should not have adopted this course had there been anything in the 'Constitution' of S. James's, or any engagement entered into by me, to restrain me from doing so; but no restraint of any kind existed. My action, also, was simply a personal one, done in the exercise of my own individual and lawful liberty, and involving no one in its consequences but myself. At the same time, it is a source of satisfaction to me to know (as I do) that the step I have taken is in accordance with the prevailing sentiment of my congregation.

"I should have greatly desired to invite an expression of their sentiment previously to taking this step, but there were the strongest reasons, in connection with Miss Bannerman's legacy, that the congregation should take no part in the matter, and that the act should be entirely my own.

"For those who take a different view of the subject from myself, I feel the most respectful sympathy. They are not, however, in the least compromised by what I have done; and I hope they will soon be able to understand that I have not only done what was right, but also acted for the best interests and lasting peace of our Church."

In 1880 Mr Black, Mr Allen's successor, obtained a licence from Bishop Suther, and he voted in the election of Bishop Douglas in 1883.* The defender Mr Mackay, who was in English orders, and who was appointed to the charge in 1885, obtained a licence from Bishop Douglas.†

Thereafter candidates from the congregation were presented by the incumbent, after notice to the congregation, for confirmation, and were confirmed by the Bishop of Aberdeen. None of these confirmations took place in St James's Church.

J. R. Jones, treasurer to the vestry of St James's, deponed,—" . . . There were no confirmations of candidates from St James's Church anywhere prior to Mr Allen's time, so far as I am aware. I never heard of them. Candidates for the church were not confirmed at that time. They were simply prepared, and then admitted to Communion without confirmation. I joined the congregation on 18th May 1866. I cannot say why the candidates from St James's have not since Mr Allen's time been confirmed in St James's; that is a matter that is left entirely to the clergyman. That matter was never submitted to the managers, and is not in any way a matter which comes within their sphere. . . ."

James Petrie Kay, one of the managers, and a defender, deponed, —" I have been a member of the congregation for thirty years. (Q.) In your view the congregation have done nothing to connect themselves with the Scottish Episcopal Church? (A.) They have done

* Canon III. (1876),—" The clergy who have a right to vote shall consist of all presbyters instituted to a cure of souls within the diocese, whether to a single or collegiate chapel, and of presbyters who have resided within the diocese and held a formal licence from the bishop, and officiated continuously in the diocese, though not necessarily in the same place, for not less than two years immediately preceding. . . ."

† Mr Mackay's licence was in the following terms:—" The Reverend Angus Mason Mackay, B.A., London University, having this day appeared before us, exhibited his letters of orders, testimonials, and title for nomination, and having, moreover, in our presence subscribed the thirty-nine articles and code of canons of the Church, is hereby licensed to perform all the duties competent to his order in the Church of St James's and the district attached thereto in our diocese. A. G. ABERDEEN AND ORKNEY."

nothing so far as I ever heard. (Q.) Prior to the licence being taken, you say the members of the congregation did not as a rule receive the rite of confirmation? (A.) Not as a rule; in fact I did not know anyone who did. If they did they would have required to go to England in order to receive it. The rule then was that a candidate was prepared for confirmation, but was accepted without confirmation. (Q.) Was the rule, since the licence has been taken, that the congregation have had the services of the Bishop of Aberdeen to confirm these candidates? (A.) Well, the individual members of the congregation have had the advantage."

Bishop Douglas deponed,—"There never was any agreement between me, as representing the Scottish Episcopal Church, and the managers of St James's, or the congregation of St James's. . . . Mr Mackay from the beginning was the person who asked me to grant him the licence. If I had given him, as a clergyman ordained in the English Church, no licence, and he came to discharge duty within my diocese, there would have been great difficulty in his receiving preferment in the Church of England afterwards. . . . I have never confirmed in St James's Church, because it has no connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church at all. My jurisdiction extends over the whole diocese, but the edifice of St James's has never been attached to the Church by any document or deed of any sort or kind; it does not come within my touch. . . . Confirmation is a certificate that the clergyman who has prepared the candidate, and the bishop who has confirmed him, consider he is a fit recipient for the holy sacrament, and it connects him with the whole Anglican communion, not specially with the Scottish Episcopal Church. . . . The constitution of St James's has never been submitted to me for sanction. I don't think I have ever seen it. If it contains a provision by which the clergyman may, by a majority of three-fourths, on certain notice, be deprived of his charge—that is a constitution which would not be sanctioned by the practice of the Scottish Episcopal Church." Witness mentioned other particulars in which St James's Church did not conform to the requirements of the canons. "I regard the position of St James's and of its ministry as perfectly anomalous. It certainly does not come within any description of any kind as a congregation of the Episcopal Church recognised in the canons."

As holder of the bishop's licence Mr Mackay became a member, and acted as a member, of the Diocesan Synod and Diocesan Council, and he also attended the meetings of the Representative Church Council (of the Scottish Episcopal Church) when these meetings were held in Aberdeen.

Mr Mackay also interchanged pulpits with clergymen of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and services were on his invitation not infrequently conducted in St James's by the Bishop of Aberdeen.

Collections also came to be made in St James's for the Home Mission, Foreign Mission, and Education funds of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and these contributions were entered in the list of returns from the diocese of Aberdeen in the "Year Book," which was recognised as its official calendar by the authorities of the Scottish Episcopal Church. In the same book St James's was entered as a congregation of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and its incumbent as one of the clergy thereof, and the members of St James's congregation were included in the statistics of "church population" which were given therein.

Bannerman v. Bannerman's Trustee.

In a leaflet issued monthly to the congregation the incumbent repeatedly urged the claims of the Home Mission and other funds of the Scottish Episcopal Church. In the leaflet for December 1890 he wrote,—"The title 'rector.'—By a recent canon of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, the title incumbent is done away with, and that of rector put in its place. . . . But while I have my doubts as to the advisability of the change, the canon having been passed, I, of course, comply with it, and must hereafter, therefore, be known not as your incumbent but your rector." The leaflet of January 1891 contained the following notice:—"Confirmation Classes.—The Lord Bishop of the Diocese will hold a confirmation at St Andrew's Church about Eastertide, at which candidates from St James's will be presented. Classes will be formed both for younger members and for adults. Candidates should send in the names at once to the rector." Similar notices appeared from time to time.

The constitution of the Church was not altered, and the bishop claimed no authority over the congregation.

On 26th February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) assoilzied the defenders, finding the defenders other than Macqueen entitled to expenses, but to the expenses of one defence only, subject to modification as regarded the expenses in connection with the proof, which were modified to one-fourth of the taxed amount.*

* "OPINION.— . . . I may explain at the outset that St James's Episcopal Church was an offshoot (which came off in 1854) from St Paul's Episcopal Church in Aberdeen—that church being at the time one of the so-called 'English Episcopal Churches in Scotland,' which, while using the English liturgy and being in communion with the Church of England, have always held aloof from the Scottish Episcopal Church, and have not recognised the authority of its bishops or canons. It is not necessary to enter into the history of the circumstances under which those English Episcopal Churches came into existence. That history will be found set forth in the report of the case of Dunbar v. Skinner, 11 D. 945. It only requires to be said that there were originally a number of those churches, but that, as the disabilities attaching to the Scottish Episcopal clergy and their congregations were from time to time relaxed, the number gradually diminished. At the present time, besides the church in question, there are only three such congregations left—one in Edinburgh, one in Glasgow, and one, I think, in Montrose. Each of those congregations has a separate congregational existence, and each has a separate constitution. The constitution of St James's, Aberdeen, is produced, and is No. 14 of process. I do not know that any of its provisions require special notice, except that it requires as an essential article that the incumbent of the church shall always hold English orders.

"The question I have to decide is, as I have said, whether the congregation of St James's has become 'united to or in connection with' the Scottish Episcopal Church. But really the question is—whether it has become connected with that church in the sense of the settlement; for the pursuers do not, I understand, contend or suggest that there has, as yet at least, been anything which could be described as union.

"Now, the term 'connection' is, it must be confessed, a somewhat loose term. It is not a term which is known in ecclesiastical history, or in the history of the Scottish Episcopal Church, or of these particular congregations. In popular language, it is often employed in senses so loose and indefinite as to be quite outside the cognisance of a Court of law. It is, therefore, here necessary to find a sense for the expression which shall satisfy the words of the will, and also be sufficiently tangible to base the forfeiture of a legal right. It was argued for the defenders, and I am

The pursuers reclaimed.

The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Court.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question before us is whether, in the sense of Miss Bannerman's will, the defenders' congregation is now "in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church."

It is convenient, first, to consider what was the position of this congregation during Miss Bannerman's life, and then to see what it is now.

First of all, then, this congregation held all the tenets and used all the formularies of the Church of England, and none other. By the Constitution St James's Church was to be used "for the ministration of sacred ordinances, in strict conformity with the articles of the Church of England, and by law established, and ritual conform thereto, as the same have been heretofore followed and observed by the said Church and none other, and especially excluding and prohibiting all innovations by inclined to agree with them, that in order to reach a connection in this sense several conditions must at least be satisfied.

"(1) The connection must be between the Scottish Episcopal Church and the congregation,—that is to say, the congregation as distinguished from the incumbent.

"(2) It must also be something direct and tangible—something of which a Court of law can take cognisance.

"(3) It must also result in some tie—some vinculum—stronger or weaker—fettering pro tanto the independence of the congregation.

"In short, the connection may be short of union, but it must be something ejusdem generis with union—I mean union temporary or permanent.

"Now, what are the facts brought out by this long and tedious proof—a proof which, I must observe in passing, has only served to shew that there are no facts of importance in dispute, and that there should have been no difficulty in adjusting a minute of admissions sufficient for the decision of the case.

"There are, in the first place, certain things which are not proved, and, indeed, not alleged:—

"1. There has been no change in the constitution of St James's Church. That remains intact.

"2. There has been no agreement of any kind, written or verbal, between the congregation and the Scottish Episcopal Church. Indeed, no communications, written or verbal, have ever, so far as appears, passed between the two bodies or their officials,—excepting always certain statistical statements, and contributions to mission schemes, transmitted to Edinburgh, as I shall afterwards notice.

"The case of the pursuers accordingly is, and must be, that the alleged connection exists, and has been established, not by convention, but by a course of action; and the first matter founded on is the acceptance by each of the incumbents of the church since 1877 of a licence from the Bishop of Aberdeen.

"Now, that, since 1877, licences have been so accepted is quite true, and the history of the matter seems to be this: Prior to 1877 the English churches in Scotland had no bishop to whom they could apply (for example) for confirmation. Their own incumbents had no licences from the Scottish bishops, and could not therefore present candidates to those bishops. On the other hand, no English bishop could be induced to come to Scotland for the purpose. Up, therefore, to 1877, the young people of the different congregations had to be sent for confirmation to England, and, in fact, generally were so; but about that time an arrangement was made with a colonial bishop (Bishop Beckles) that he should perform episcopal individuals or sects." The cure of the church was to be held "by clergymen having the orders of the Church of England as by law established, and the Episcopal Church in Ireland, and by such only." The result is that the congregation held exactly what the Church of England holds, with one added restriction, which made it more English than the Church of England has been since 1864,—for this Aberdeen congregation could accept no clergyman who had other than English or Irish orders.

According to its constitution the congregation held to the system of Episcopacy, as that is involved in the English Prayer Book. The practical working of that system in relation to an "English Episcopal" congregation in Scotland at once calls attention to its relations to the Scottish Episcopal Church. Side by side with those isolated "English Episcopal" congregations stood the Scottish Episcopal Church, equipped with an effective Episcopate. Yet from this Church the "English Episcopalians" held aloof. Their children were prepared for confirmation, and were told that they would have either to go to England to be confirmed, or to wait till an English Bishop was in Aberdeen. In the case of St James's this indefinite functions within the several congregations; and Bishop Beckles accordingly came down to Scotland. In the interval, however—the English bishops having come to consider that the Scottish Episcopal Church was in full communion with the Church of England, and that it was contrary to ecclesiastical order that any Anglican bishop should officiate within the diocese of any Anglican bishop, whether Scottish or English, without that bishop's consent—a resolution was passed by convocation censuring the arrangement with Bishop Beckles, and in effect condemning as contrary to the law and practice of the Anglican Church the position of the incumbents of the several Episcopal Churches in Scotland, of which St James's, Aberdeen, was one. These incumbents were clergymen in English orders, performing their sacred functions in recognised bishoprics without the licence of the bishop; and when the question was once raised that position was pronounced to be indefensible.

"The result was that towards the end of 1877 Mr Allen, the then incumbent of St James's, declined to recognise Bishop Beckles, and applied for and obtained a licence from the Bishop of Aberdeen; and his two successors, Mr Black and the present incumbent, Mr Mackay, took the same course. By doing so, it cannot, I think, be doubted that they became, while they held their licences, to all effects clergymen of the Scottish Episcopal Church. They became bound to obey its canons, and subject to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Aberdeen; and personally their relation to the bishop and to the Church was not different from that of the other clergy in the diocese of Aberdeen. The licence might no doubt be renounced, and its renunciation would not affect their incumbency; and, of course, to that extent they were in a different position from other incumbents. But so long as they held the bishop's licence they were beyond doubt connected in the most direct and tangible sense with the Scottish Episcopal Church.

"The question, however is, whether the acceptance by successive incumbents of the bishop's licence established in the sense of Miss Bannerman's settlement a connection between the Scottish Episcopal Church and the congregation of St James's. In a loose sense it no doubt did so. The incumbent had relations with the Church, and the congregation had, of course, relations with the incumbent; but as between the Church and the congregation no direct relation of any kind was established. They stood just as they had stood before. The congregation were not parties to the incumbent's action. The members, no doubt, knew of it and did not object.

postponement was the course universally followed. The reason was that, owing to a dislike of the Scotch communion office (which is used in some of the congregations of that Church), the "English Episcopalians" held themselves apart from the ministrations of the Scottish Bishops. Not the less, however, did the congregation of St James's adhere in theory (as by its constitution it was bound) to the rubric in the Prayer Book, which directs that "so soon as children are come to a competent age, and can say in their mother tongue the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the ten commandments, and can also answer to the other questions of the Catechism, they shall be brought to the bishop."

The next point as to the position of St James's in Miss Bannerman's lifetime is a negative one, but it is of salient importance. The incumbent of St James's held no licence from the Bishop of Aberdeen.

The result was that, in Miss Bannerman's days, St James's congregation had—(I shall not use the contentious word "connection")—no relation whatever to the Scottish Episcopal Church. It turned its back on the

But if it did not affect their position they had no call to object. The incumbent was not prohibited by the constitution from holding any licence which he thought useful; and all that the congregation could do, if they did object, was to exercise their power under the constitution to dismiss the incumbent. They had that power and, of course, they might exercise it. But the fact that they had such a power and could exercise it at any time is itself really conclusive against any change having been made in the congregation's position. They were as independent as ever, and neither gave nor received anything. Their position simply was that they were connected by a tie dissoluble at their pleasure with a person (viz., their incumbent) who was connected by a tie dissoluble at his pleasure with the Scottish Episcopal Church. Now that, it seems to me, is a connection much too indirect and remote to satisfy the condition expressed in Miss Bannerman's will.

"The pursuers, however, rely upon certain other matters which they say grew out of the incumbent's new position, and directly affected the congregation. I do not refer to the facts that the incumbent from 1877 downwards has been a member of the Diocesan Synod, and the Representative Church Council, and has had all the rights and privileges of a clergyman holding a licence from a bishop, with a definite sphere of duty. I have already dealt with these matters, which, as I have said, I consider personal to the clergyman. But the matters now in question are said to be these:—

"1. That the congregation take the benefit of the incumbent's new position by having their young people confirmed by the Bishop of Aberdeen.

"2. That they take the benefit of the exchange of pulpits now possible between their incumbent and the incumbents of the other churches in Aberdeen.

"3. That in the same way they take the benefit of the bishop's assistance in the services of the church—he being now accustomed frequently to officiate, although always upon invitation.

"4. That returns of statistics of membership, &c., are from time to time made by the officials of St James's Church to the offices of the Scottish Episcopal Church, which returns are published in the year-books and other books published or recognised by the authorities of the Scottish Episcopal Church.

"5. That collections are frequently made for certain schemes of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and particularly its mission schemes and education scheme.

"I am bound to say, that I have had some difficulty as to the combined effect of these several matters. The incumbents and the congregation have certainly so acted as to reduce to a minimum all external manifestations of

Bishop of Aberdeen, and looked wistfully to England for Episcopal ministrations.

What is its present position in that regard?

Since 1877 the successive incumbents of St James's have subscribed the canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and received the licence of the Bishop of Aberdeen, and have become, in consequence, so far as their personal duties and status are concerned, clergy of that Church. Mr Mackay, the present incumbent, like his predecessors, was ordained priest in England, but he holds the Bishop of Aberdeen's licence to officiate in St James's; he is a member of the Diocesan Synod and of the Representative Church Council, and he says, in so many words,—"I hold myself to be a Scottish Episcopalian, personally." His allegiance to the Bishop of Aberdeen is exactly the same as that of any other clergyman in the diocese. Part of his duty is to prepare, and bring to the Bishop those whom he has prepared for confirmation, and since 1877 the young people of St James's have been taken to the Bishop of Aberdeen and confirmed by him. The confirmations have always, and purposely, been held in another of the churches,—or rather, I should say, in one of the churches,—of the Episcopal communion. Thus, through the relation between the clergyman of St James's the differences which divide them from the other Episcopal churches in Aberdeen. They have done so, I have no doubt, from the best of motives; so much so, that it occurs to one to ask whether, for the sake of preserving their hold on Miss Bannerman's legacy, it is really worth while to perpetuate those differences. But whatever the motive may have been, the fact remains. And I confess it does seem to me that the congregation entered upon somewhat dangerous ground (with respect I mean to Miss Bannerman's legacy) when they began not only to co-operate with the other Episcopal churches in mission and other work, but to allow their statistics of membership to be included in the statistics of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and their contributions to the schemes of that Church to appear without note of distinction in its publications. Still co-operation is one thing, and union or connection is another; and there is undoubted force in the defenders' argument (1) that they are not responsible for the form in which the accounts of the Scottish Episcopal Church are kept; and (2) that there is nothing which they as a congregation do, or have done, which might not be done by congregations of the Church of England across the Tweed, or by persons accustomed to gather for English service in private chapels or schoolhouses throughout Scotland. There is also, I think, great force in their view that in all essential matters—all matters which affect the independence and autonomy of the congregation—the distinctions which have always existed are still maintained. I do not think it necessary to go over those matters in detail. They are very distinctly and correctly recited in the 14th article of the defenders' statement, and also in the evidence of Bishop Douglas. The general result is that in everything which can be called crucial, the congregation of St James's is as separate and unconnected with the Scottish Church as any church of the Anglican communion can be—I mean any church situated within the diocese of a Scottish bishop. So far, of course, some degree of connection is inevitable, and exists. But it is not, I think, the kind of connection contemplated by Miss Bannerman's settlement.

"On the whole, therefore, I have found myself unable to come to any other conclusion than that the pursuers have failed to establish the forfeiture which they ask the Court to declare; and therefore that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor."

and the Bishop of Aberdeen, those worshipping in St James's enjoy the ministration of the bishop in that ordinance which alone brings the laity into direct relation with the bishop as such.

I have stated generally the position of the incumbent of St James's in relation to the bishop, but it is necessary to examine this more closely.

It is in accordance with the idea of the solidarity of the Anglican Communion all over the world that its bishops should not interfere with one another's dioceses, and that its clergy should subject themselves to the government of the bishop of whatever diocese they propose to minister in. The definitive recognition of this rule by the Church of England in relation to the Episcopal Church of Scotland led to the English clergymen who have successively been incumbents of St James's since 1877 applying for and obtaining the licence of the Bishop of Aberdeen. The terms of the licence of the present incumbent deserve attention.* It will be observed that he is licensed by the bishop to "perform all the duties competent to his order in the Church of St James's and the district attached thereto in our diocese."

It remains to mention certain incidental results of the bishop's licence. The incumbent's tenure of the licence makes it permissible for the clergy of the diocese, as well as for the bishop himself, to officiate in St James's, and in fact bishop and clergy alike officiate.

There are offertories each year in St James's Church for the Mission Fund and for the Education Fund of the Scottish Episcopal Church. Some minor evidences of rapprochement and co-operation between this congregation and the other Episcopal congregations in Aberdeen were pointed to by the pursuers on the principle juncta juvant. They also founded on the leaflets periodically issued to the congregation by the clergyman, and the tone in which "the bishop," "the Education Fund," the "Diocesan Council," and various other institutions of the Scottish Episcopal Church, are spoken of in exactly the same way as if St James's were one of the regular congregations of that communion; while, on the other hand, there does not seem to be any mention made of any separate or isolated characteristic of the congregation as distinguished from other Episcopal congregations. The circumstances last enumerated were not dwelt upon by the pursuers as substantively and still less as separately constituting a connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church, but rather as illustrating what is, in the understanding of all concerned, the true and real position of the congregation.

On these facts the Lord Ordinary is constrained to say that, "in a loose sense," there is a "connection"; while in another part of his opinion he had remarked, on the word "connection," that it is "a somewhat loose term." If those two passages taken together mean that, in the colloquial sense of a colloquial term there is a connection, the defenders' case would seem to be in some danger. Their arguments, however, as condensed in the opinion, deserve serious consideration.

Their main point is that Miss Bannerman's condition applies to the congregation, that the congregation, as distinguished from the clergyman, must be found to be in connection with the Episcopal Church, and that this congregation has done nothing whatever by way of forming a connection. The congregation, they say, stands where it did.

If the formal and overt action of the congregation, acting as such, be necessary to the existence of a connection, then there is none, for no congregational meeting has been held on the subject. But is any such formal and overt action necessary?

It is not unimportant to notice that while the word "uniting" in the will (I quote from the words declaring the events in which devolution is to take place) does point to action, the word "being" (in connection) points to a state, condition, or relation, irrespective of its cause.

The Lord Ordinary says there has been no change in the constitution, but this does not seem to prove much. Without violating any term of the existing constitution that has been pointed out to us, the congregation might have entered into a compact with the Bishop of Aberdeen accepting his supervision. They might, as far as I can see, have entered into such a concordat as was formed between their mother church, St Paul's, and the Bishop Skinner, of the days of Sir W. Dunbar, the terms of which are given in 11 D. 948, or such a concordat as took place, in more recent times, between Bishop Cotterill and St Thomas's, Edinburgh, and is spoken to by the witness Stuart.

Well, now, supposing there had been no Miss Bannerman's legacy, and this congregation had entered into a concordat with Bishop Douglas, agreeing that exactly those things should be done which have been done, and no more, and that the agreement should be terminable at pleasure, would that make a connection? I say yes, and the defenders have difficulty in saying no. And is there any difference when the relation is established not by formal agreement but by the accepted action of the clergyman? The defenders' argument loses sight of the fact that, from the necessary conditions of things, in nine-tenths of the matters affecting a congregation the pastor acts and the congregation does not act at all. He acts, and necessarily acts, not solely for himself but as affecting and for the congregation. The clergyman cannot connect himself with the Scottish Episcopal Church by being one of its clergy without himself constituting a connection between his congregation and that Church. The duties of which his bishop is the overseer are his duties to the people to whom the bishop has licensed him to minister. It is quite true that the people who worship in St James's do not constitute a "congregation" in the sense of the canons of the Scottish Episcopal Church, nor yet a "mission," nor yet a "mission charge." As the Bishop of Aberdeen says, the position of St James's is "anomalous," and it has not in the meantime been regularised. The result is undoubtedly that they retained their independence. The bishop is quite right in law in saying that he could not force his way into the church as he could into those churches whose title-deeds and constitutions provide that they are Scottish Episcopal Churches. But all this—all that is set out in the answer to condescendence 14 (to which the Lord Ordinary refers)—merely negatives union; I do not think that it negatives connection.

We are to put ourselves in the position of Miss Bannerman by attending to the ecclesiastical position of her congregation during her life, and the possible directions in which it might look for alliance in the difficult position in which an "Episcopal" congregation must necessarily stand which has no bishop. In her days the "English Episcopal" congregations, whose separate existence was grounded on dislike of the Scottish Episcopal Church, extended to the Church of England an affection which was very sparingly returned. All her life, however, there was still the chance of help and countenance from some Bishop Waldegrave, or even some Bishop Beckles, for Convocation did not speak till the year after her death. Accordingly, even if separation from both Episcopal Churches (of England and Scotland) would have been intolerable to Miss Bannerman, the door was not yet closed on the English side. In forbidding such a connection as now exists, she was therefore not consciously condemning her congregation to independency, although I do not know whether she might not have considered this to be the lesser evil.

I go, of course, so far with the Lord Ordinary, that it is not every casual or incidental co-operation with the Scottish Episcopal Church which was intended to be proscribed. But the connection in which the congregation is now and has been for nearly twenty years is not casual or incidental. The fact that it is terminable does not make it the less a connection so long as it lasts, and the attitude of the congregation in the present action shews that the existing relation between the two bodies is fully known and deliberately adopted by the congregation. While realising that the case is one on which opinion may easily be divided, my judgment is for the pursuers.

LORD M'LAREN.—After repeated consideration of this case, I am not satisfied that the Lord Ordinary's grounds of judgment are wrong, and I am unable to concur in the judgment proposed. I do not think there is any material difference between my colleagues and myself as to the facts established by the proof and the productions. The question is, whether these facts amount to a "uniting or being in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church" on the part of the congregation, so as to bring into operation the conditional destination of Miss Bannerman's legacy to her next of kin. The expression "uniting with" the Scottish Episcopal Church I take to denote an agreement by the congregation to become to all effects a congregation of that Church, subject to its canons, Church government, and discipline. It was conceded by pursuers' counsel, and it is perfectly clear, that such a union has not in fact taken place. It is more difficult to define what is meant by "being in connection" with a Church. I think the most obvious meaning is that by which the expression is to be read as synonymous with or exegetical of the word "uniting." It is not to be overlooked that the word "unite" is properly descriptive of the incorporation of two churches or assemblages of congregations in one rather than of the absorption of an individual congregation in a larger organisation such as that of the Scottish Episcopal Church; and it is quite intelligible that the complex expression "uniting or being in connection with" might be used by the testatrix to describe such an absorption of the congregation in the larger body for want of a single term precisely descriptive of the change which she deprecated, and which was to be the condition of her gift passing to her next of kin.

I am the more disposed to favour this reading, because I have experienced the difficulty which the Lord Ordinary felt in attempting to affix a definite meaning to the word "connection," distinct from that which is implied in the term "union." In construing such expressions, especially as used by a testator who is known to have been an attached member of the congregation to which the legacy is given, I think we may take notice of certain principles of Church government which are common to the Episcopalian churches, and to many other Christian communities, I mean that the ecclesiastical organisation will not in general make terms with a congregation entering its communion. The congregation must accept the constitution of the Church as it exists, or remain independent. I have no conception that the Scottish Episcopal Church would enter into a contract with an individual congregation on different terms from those which govern its relations to other congregations; and I think it unlikely that Miss Bannerman should have contemplated any other kind of union or connection than one under which the congregation should accept the Scottish Episcopal Church as its ecclesiastical superior, and submit to be governed by its canons. I think I may call in aid of this view the circumstance that at the time when Miss Bannerman made her will the doctrines and forms of worship of the Scottish Episcopal Church and the congregation of St James's were really identical. The forfeiture, therefore, was not directed against changes of doctrine or worship, but, as I think, against corporate action, and I have difficulty in seeing how the congregation could approximate to or enter into connection with the Church in any other way than by being legally incorporated with it. I may also observe that while the Lord Ordinary has considered the possibility of there being a connection short of complete union, he has not been able to figure a concrete case of such a connection, and the criteria which he proposes could not, as I think, be satisfied by any action on the part of St James's under its existing constitution.

I wish to avoid entering upon any topics that are not strictly relevant to the construction of this bequest. But we are entitled to look to the history of the two Churches in order to understand the testator's point of view, and, without entering into minute details, what I find is, that the distinction between the Scottish Episcopal Church and the assemblage of congregations in Scotland calling themselves English Episcopalians has been always much more a political distinction than a distinction founded on differences of doctrine or worship. The distinction throughout the eighteenth century was a very real one, inasmuch as the ancient Episcopal Church in Scotland was subjected to civil disabilities because of its refusal to comply with certain tests that were thought necessary for the security of the State, while the congregations forming the other community accepted these tests, and enjoyed the protection of the State. In the early part of this century there was only a difference in the liturgy, and in Miss Bannerman's time that distinction had almost disappeared, owing to the very general use of the English Church service by the congregations of the Scottish Episcopal Church. But it is consistent with experience that historical associations may have an influence in fixing the attachment of members of religious communities to their Churches. Miss Bannerman had been brought up as an "English Episcopalian," and it is to my mind intelligible, and indeed most natural, that she should desire to continue, and if possible to perpetuate, the separate existence of the congregation to which she was attached, and that she should view with disfavour the prospect of its absorption into a Church which was not her Church, though separated from it perhaps by a somewhat thin partition. It is also conceivable that she may have considered that in the event of St James's joining the Scottish Episcopal communion the congregation would participate in the endowments of that body, and that her gift would not be needed. These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the "union or connection" to which the testatrix referred was neither more nor less than a complete ecclesiastical incorporation of the congregation in the Scottish Episcopal Church.

But if I am to assume that "connection" means something different from incorporation, then I am of opinion that, in this view also, the case of the pursuers fails, because the constitution of St James's Church remains unaltered since the death of the testatrix. In order to bring the substitutionary bequest into operation, I think there must be some transformation of the status or corporate character of the congregation tending in the direction of alliance with the Scottish Episcopal Church. But the acts founded on are, as I conceive, acts of the clergyman chiefly, not proved to proceed from the congregation, and not affecting its autonomy. They are briefly these two: that Mr Mackay accepted a licence from the Bishop of Aberdeen, and that he encouraged or advised the young people of the congregation to present themselves to the Bishop for confirmation. As to the first of these acts, I am not satisfied that the congregation could have obtained the services of a qualified clergyman unless he was permitted to hold the bishop's licence; and it is certain that the clergyman would have exposed himself to the censure of the Church of England (to which this congregation professed allegiance) if he had officiated in Aberdeen without the licence of the bishop. I infer from the evidence of Bishop Douglas himself (the best authority on such a subject) that the acceptance of the bishop's licence was regarded as a customary act of respect to the local ecclesiastical authority, and that it created no ecclesiastical relation between the congregation and the bishop or the Church which he represented, but only a personal relation between the bishop and the clergyman. The bishop in his evidence disclaims all authority over the congregation, and his action during the period of Mr Mackay's ministry is entirely consistent with his disclaimer. On the second point, it is indisputable that the congregation of St James's, having accepted the English Articles and Liturgy, also accepted confirmation as a religious rite; and I think that Mr Mackay might advise candidates for the rite of confirmation to avail themselves of the spiritual services of the Bishop of Aberdeen without thereby bringing the congregation into connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church. The English Episcopal community in Scotland never had a bishop of its own, and if its members desired confirmation they could only obtain it from the bishop of another communion. In this there was no novelty, because the Bishop of Aberdeen, in giving confirmation, did not claim to do so as matter of right, any more than the Bishop of Carlisle had done when he acted in a similar capacity in Miss Bannerman's lifetime.

I do not enter upon such minor elements as the inviting subscriptions to church charities, or the reading of the bishop's pastoral addresses to the congregation of St James's, because these acts clearly would not of themselves constitute a connection with the church. But I note, in conclusion, that the testatrix distinguishes between acts of the clergyman and acts of the congregation—the former being referred to the judgment of her trustees, while as to the latter the forfeiture is unqualified. I am unable to hold that the forfeiture has in fact been incurred, and I think that the action ought to be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I have found this to be a question of difficulty, and my difficulty has been increased by the reasoning of Lord M'Laren and the Lord Ordinary. But, upon the best consideration I can give to the case, I have come to the same conclusions as your Lordship in the chair, and for the same reasons.

The difficulty lies in determining what the testatrix meant by the two phrases which she uses in her will, when she says that her legacy is to be applied for the purposes of this Episcopal Church so long as the congregation worshipping in the said church shall not be "united to or in connection with" the Scottish Episcopal Church. Now, these words are in no sense technical. They are words of ordinary language, and I do not think that either of them is susceptible of very exact definition. They are, indeed, metaphorical terms, and they may be applied to an indefinite variety of circumstances. It appears to me therefore to be a very unsafe method of construing the will to begin by attempting to give an exhaustive definition either of the term "union" or of the term "connection," and then to proceed to consider whether the concrete facts of a particular case can be brought within the formula which has been antecedently laid down upon purely abstract considerations. I think the true method of construction is, to ascertain, in the first place, what are the facts of the case, and then to inquire whether the state of things which has been found to exist may or may not be aptly described by one or other of the terms employed by the testatrix.

Now, in considering that question, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that it is essential to begin by inquiring what was the position occupied by this Episcopal congregation at the time when Miss Bannerman's will took effect. As to that there can be no dispute. It was an Episcopal congregation in sentiment and opinion, but a congregation without a bishop. It owed no allegiance to the Bishop of Aberdeen, but on the contrary rejected his authority; and it had no connection of any kind that I can discover with the ecclesiastical organisation of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. It stood entirely aloof from that Church,—if it did not assume a position of some antagonism towards it. Now, it appears to me that in reading a will of this kind and considering its application to a church in that situation, prima facie the meaning of the testatrix must be taken to be that the church was to retain the benefit of her legacy so long as it continued to remain in that position of isolation, and no longer; and the question comes to be whether it has or has not retained that position of isolation. I am of opinion with your Lordship that it has not. The clergyman who serves the cure of the church is now a member of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. He is subject to the ecclesiastical authority and superintendence of the bishop in exactly the same manner and to the same extent as any other clergyman of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. He is a member of the governing body of that Church, and if there were a vacancy in the episcopate he would have a voice in the election of a new bishop. In consequence of having accepted the authority of the Bishop of Aberdeen he is enabled to bring the children of the congregation to the bishop for confirmation, with the right to require the ministrations of the bishop. There are a variety of other consequences following upon this action which your Lordship has enumerated, and which, as I entirely concur in your Lordship's observations upon them, I think it unnecessary to repeat.

That being the position of the church, the question is whether it may or may not with propriety be described as being united to or in connection with the Scottish Episcopal Church. I agree that it is not united to that Church. Nothing has been done to make the two bodies into one; but I am of opinion, on the other hand, that it is in connection with the Church. I think it impossible to say that a congregation whose minister is a member of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, and subject to the ecclesiastical government and superintendence of the bishops of that Church has no connection with the Episcopal Church in Scotland. And, accordingly, I think that the Lord Ordinary, and I believe also Lord M'Laren, do not dispute that, according to the established use of language it would not be an inaccurate description of the position of this church to say that it is not united to the Episcopal Church in Scotland, but that it is in connection with it. But then it is said that that is not the kind of connection which the testatrix contemplated or intended by the use of the term in her will. I have not been able to appreciate, nor have I heard formulated, the reason for so saying. It appears to me to be a very arbitrary limitation of words of ordinary language to say that they are not intended to mean what according to the established use of language they are generally supposed to mean, but must have been used in some special and restricted sense which a Court of law may think fit to impose upon them. We have no authority to guide us in the construction of words of ordinary language excepting common usage, and when a testator uses ordinary language he must be taken to have intended its ordinary meaning. In this sense, I cannot assent to the opinion that the words "connected with" are synonymous with, or exegetical of, the word "united," and it seems to me a very unfortunate form of exegesis which interprets a more definite and precise term by a wider and more indefinite term. I am of opinion with your Lordships, for the reasons you have given, that this congregation must be considered as having a connection with the Episcopal Church in Scotland. But there are two considerations of great importance which are urged to the contrary.

It is said in the first place that this is a merely temporary connection which might be severed at the will of the congregation. But then, however temporary, it is still while it lasts a connection between the congregation and the Church, and it is a connection which the congregation has indicated no intention or desire to sever.

In the second place, it is said that, such as it is, it is a connection between the clergyman and the bishop, and not between the congregation and the Church. I think your Lordship's answer is conclusive. If the congregation has in fact been brought into connection with the Church, it appears to me immaterial that this has not been done by a formal resolution of the congregation, because I agree with your Lordship that we have in this case a complete equivalent for a formal resolution. Everything which the clergyman has done in bringing himself, and through himself those to whom he ministers, into association with the Church, has been done with the consent and acquiescence of the congregation. They do not now repudiate his conduct in any way whatever. It appears to me that they could not more formally have established the connection which I think subsists between themselves and the Church than they have done by the attitude which they take up in the defence to this action.

I appreciate the force of one consideration which I think has had weight with both of my brethren, who have arrived at a different opinion, viz., that according to the present relations between the Church of England and the Episcopal Communion in Scotland, it would be extremely difficult for this congregation to obtain the services of a clergyman who refused to accept the bishop's licence. I do not think it would be impossible, but it is a fair observation that the congregation would be placed in a position of embarrassment and difficulty if they were to reject the bishop's licence. But then, I cannot say that that appears to me a relevant consideration in the construction of this will. The legacy is not forfeited as a penalty for any misconduct on the part of this congregation, but it is one of the conditions of the legacy that the congregation shall remain in a position of complete separation from the Scottish Episcopal Church. If that condition is not satisfied, it appears to me to make no difference whether the failure to satisfy it arises from the voluntary act of the congregation, or becomes inevitable from circumstances over which the congregation has no control.

I desire only to add that I concur in all your Lordship's reasons.

Fraser's Trustee v. Fraser.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire.

HUGH HAYES WATSON, accountant, Dundee, trustee on the sequestrated estates of Mrs Jane Fraser, wine and spirit-merchant, Dundee, appealed against certain deliverances of the Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith) pronounced in the course of the examination of the bankrupt.

The following excerpt from the bankrupt's deposition contains the deliverances complained of:—"At Dundee, 24th June 1896, in presence of John Campbell Smith, Esq., advocate, Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire, at Dundee. Present, . . . Compeared the bankrupt, Mrs Jane Fraser, who being solemnly sworn and examined, depones, . . . The agent for the trustee moved that the bankrupt be ordained to deliver up the permit-book. Deliverance.—The Sheriff-substitute ordained the bankrupt to allow the trustee to have access to the permit-book on all occasions desired by him when it was necessary that he should have the use of the permit-book in order to obtain information in regard to the estate: Quoad ultra refused the motion. . . . (Q.) Are you willing to give up your certificate of licence to the trustee? Deliverance.—Question disallowed. . . ."*

Argued for the appellant;—The question raised was whether the trustee was entitled to the bankrupt's permit-book and certificate, although with regard to the certificate the question was not directly raised owing to the Sheriff having refused to note the trustee's motion for its delivery. A trustee was bound to take possession of the bankrupt's books and papers,[1] and the bankrupt was under obligation to deliver them.[2] An action for exhibition by the trustee was unnecessary.[3] In the present case the trustee had an interest to demand delivery of both permit-book and certificate. The first was necessary to give him information as to the estate. Without the second he could not fulfil his duty of realising the estate. The certificate was a mere accessory of the goodwill of the business,[4] and could be transferred by the trustee, upon a sale of the business, to a new tenant of the licensed premises.[5] The trustee did not admit that, as now stated, the bankrupt was no longer tenant of the licensed premises. That statement contradicted her deposition, and, as matter of fact, she was using the certificate to carry on business there.

whom the right of property in the certificate belonged.[1] All that could be decided was whether or not the question disallowed by the Sheriff should be allowed. In Selkirk v. Coupland[2] the question who had right to the certificate was not decided in a summary way, but a minute and answers were ordered. (2) On the merits.—The obligation imposed upon the bankrupt by section 93 to produce his papers could be satisfied by exhibition, and did not necessarily require delivery.[3] A certificate to trade in exciseable liquors was a personal right, which did not pass to the executor of a deceased publican.[4] It accordingly resembled a spes successionis, and though saleable was excluded from sequestration. At any rate a certificate could only be transferred to an occupier of the licensed premises,[5] and in this case the premises, which had fallen out of lease immediately after the sequestration had since been let to the bankrupt's son, who was therefore the only possible transferee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This appeal is not a very satisfactory proceeding if the object of parties be to ascertain the ultimate rights of the trustee and the bankrupt respectively to this certificate of licence. But we must consider the matter as it is presented to us; and I think that, prima facie, the trustee is entitled to have delivered to him the permit-book, as being one of the books of this bankrupt trader, and the licence, as being a document relating to the business of the bankrupt. What right the trustee may have to make use of the certificate of licence, and his power of disposing of it, must depend upon questions which we are not in a position to decide; as thus,—if it be the fact that the bankrupt is the tenant of these premises, and is using the certificate to carry on the trade, the trustee may or may not be in a position to take the business and get the licence transferred to a purchaser of the business from him. If, on the other hand, the bankrupt can make out some such case as that suggested at the bar, that may lead to another result. On that I do not pronounce.

It seems to me that the question is, In whose hands, in the first instance, shall these documents be? And I answer that by saying, they should be in the hands of the trustee.

As regards procedure: The Sheriff has, in the first place, merely ordained the bankrupt to allow the trustee to have access to the book. That seems an inadequate remedy, and an inadequate satisfaction of the trustee's right. And accordingly I think that must be recalled. As regards the question disallowed, that raises the matter of the certificate in a very unsatisfactory way. I must say I do not think the question was necessary at all, except as a matter of mere politeness. The trustee's right to the certificate in no way depended upon the willingness of the bankrupt to give it up. Therefore I think we should go a step further, and save any questions which may arise in the Court below, by remitting to the Sheriff to order the licence to be produced and delivered to the trustee.

Voluntary Association—Sporting Club—Property—Right of majority of members to alienate property of club as a donation.—In 1869 a silver cup was presented to the curling clubs of Dumfriesshire for competition as a trophy, and these clubs (which were not incorporated societies) framed rules, under which the cup was to become the property of the club which won the cup twice in succession. In 1893 the cup was so won by the Upper Annandale Club. Thereafter, at a meeting of that club, it was resolved, by a majority of the members present, to present the cup to M. J., who had been skip of the rink which obtained the highest score on the two successive occasions on which the club had won the cup. In an action brought against M. J. by certain members of the club, who had objected to the presentation, held (dis. Lord Young) that the club not being an incorporated society the cup was the joint property of all the individual members of the club; that it was ultra vires of a majority of the members thus to give away the joint property against the wishes of the minority; and therefore that the presentation to M. J. was ineffectual.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

IN June 1895 William Murray, gardener, Moffat, and four other persons, "as individual members of the Upper Annandale Curling Club, and also as a committee elected to represent said club at a special general meeting thereof, held on 19th April 1895," brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries against Michael Johnstone, residing at Ashbank, near Moffat, praying for decree ordaining the defender "to deliver to the pursuers, as representing said club, or to the president or secretary of said club . . . a silver trophy known as the 'Waterlow Cup,' the property of the said club, which was handed over to the defender as custodier for the club for the season 1893 and 1894," or alternatively for decree for £200 as the value of the cup.

The pursuers averred (cond. 1) that in 1869 Sir Sydney H. Waterlow, sometime Member of Parliament for the county of Dumfries, presented a silver cup, thereafter known as the "Waterlow Cup," as a trophy to be played for by the curling clubs in Dumfriesshire . . . The inscription upon the cup was as follows:—"Dumfriesshire Challenge Cup. Presented by Sir Sydney H. Waterlow, M.P., 1869, to be played for annually, and open to all comers resident in the county, the winner three consecutive years to keep the cup," and that this inscription and certain rules were considered as the conditions on which the cup was played for down to 8th October 1890. (Cond. 2) "At the meeting of the 'cup competition,' held in Greyfriars Hall on Wednesday the 3d October 1889, Mr Young, Moffat, gave notice" for next annual meeting of a motion to change the conditions on which the cup should be played for. "Intimation of the proposal to change the condition under which the cup was played for was duly sent to Sir Sydney H. Waterlow, who, in reply, intimated that he would be satisfied with any alteration which met with the approval of the majority of the clubs. The motion of Mr Young was adopted, and the rules revised accordingly, and the following rule substituted for the previous conditions:—'The club which has gained the highest number of shots per rink shall be the winners, and the skip of the highest winning rink from the winning club shall be the holder of the cup till next match. The cup shall become the property of the club winning twice in succession, or three times in all after date December 1890.' The Waterlow Cup was won in the years 1887, under the old rules, and in 1891 and 1893, under the new rules, by the Moffat Club [i.e., the Upper Annandale Club]. As there was no play in 1892, the cup became the absolute property of said club, as having been won by them twice in succession. The cup was accordingly handed over by the Dumfriesshire Curling Association to the Moffat Club in the latter season, and was taken charge of by Mr Michael Johnstone, who was the skip of the rink having the greatest majority on the Moffat side, as custodier for the club. The defender, Michael Johnstone, still retains possession of the cup as custodian for the club."

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 3) "Shortly after the trophy had been won by the club, an informal movement was set on foot by some of the defender's friends with the view of getting the consent of the club to the presentation of the cup to the defender as his absolute property, he having skipped the rink which obtained the highest score on the Moffat side twice in succession. . . ." (Cond. 5) "The general meeting of the club was held on 3d November 1893, and amongst other business the question of what was to be done with the Waterlow Cup was brought before the meeting. It was moved and seconded that it be presented to the defender. A counter motion to the effect that, 'as this matter had not been put down as part of the business for this meeting, a special meeting should be called, say in a month, to decide as to what should be done with the cup' was carried against the motion by a majority of nineteen to seven. The membership of the club at the date of this meeting was eighty-seven, of whom only twenty-six members were present. . . ." (Cond. 6) "On the 13th November 1893, a circular was issued calling a 'special general meeting' of the club, to be held on the evening of the 16th of that month, the business being stated, inter alia, 'to decide as to the disposal of the Waterlow Cup.' At this meeting forty-four members were present, and two motions were submitted to the meeting with regard to the cup, viz.:—(1) That the cup be kept by the club as their own property; and (2) that it be presented to the defender. On taking the vote it was found that there was a majority of votes in favour of presenting the cup to the defender." A protest was lodged, and was subsequently "signed by twenty-eight members, being three more than had voted for presenting the cup. On the result of the vote being communicated to the defender, he intimated his intention to accept of the cup. No presentation of the cup following on the resolution has yet been made to him. . . ." Thereafter in consequence of a requisition signed by forty-five members of the club who were adverse to the defender getting the cup, "a special general meeting of the club was held on 2d February 1894, when the motion to rescind the resolution gifting the cup to the defender was unanimously carried. At this meeting fifty members of the club were present. . . ."

The pursuers then stated that in consequence of the defender refusing to deliver the cup, a special general meeting of the club was held on 19th April 1895, at which they were appointed a committee with power to take such proceedings as they might think advisable for the purpose of recovering possession of the cup.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said Waterlow Cup being the property of the whole members of the Upper Annandale Curling Club, the resolution to make a gift thereof to the defender without the unanimous consent of the members was ultra vires and illegal. (2) The majority of the club being opposed to giving away a portion of the club's property to the defender, the pursuers, as individuals, and as representing the club, are entitled to decree as craved in the petition. (4) The said resolution having been carried by a small minority of the club in the face of a formal protest by other members present at the meeting, and the protestors being joint owners of said cup, they and the other members of said club who were not present at the meeting are not bound by said resolution. (5) In any event, the said resolution was properly and legally rescinded by a majority of the club before any presentation was made, and before the same was confirmed at the general meeting.

The defender on record did not admit the whole of the foregoing averments, his answer to cond. 2 in particular being as follows:—(Ans. 2) "Admitted that the Waterlow Cup was won by a rink of the members of the Upper Annandale Curling Club, skipped by the defender in the years 1887, 1891, and 1893. Also admitted that the cup is in defender's possession. Quoad ultra not known, and not admitted"; and besides pleas to the pursuers' title to sue, he stated pleas in law to the effect that the competitions even after October 1890 took place under the original rules, under which (as he maintained) the cup belonged to him individually as skip of the winning rink for two successive years; but at the hearing before the Second Division, he did not dispute the substantial accuracy, in point of fact, of the pursuers' averments, and his defence came mainly to turn on the soundness of the following plea in law stated by him,—(6) In any event, if the members of said club had right to said cup, it was presented to defender by a majority of members present at the meeting of 16th November 1893, and he is entitled to retain same.

There was no proof, and at the hearing before the Second Division the parties stated that they could give the Court no definite information as to the clubs described as "the curling clubs in Dumfriesshire," or as to the procedure by which these clubs made and altered their rules.

On 16th October 1895 the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (2) that in 1893, the cup having been won by the Upper Annandale Curling Club the requisite number of times, according to the conditions on which it was then played for, became the absolute property of said club: . . . Finds that the members of the Upper Annandale Curling Club had power, at the special general meeting of 16th November 1893, duly called for that purpose, to make a gift of the cup to defender, and that they were not entitled at any subsequent meeting to rescind said gift: Therefore repels the pleas in law stated for the pursuers: Sustains the sixth plea in law stated for the defender: Assoilzies him from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."

July 8, 1896. Murray v. Johnstone.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Campbell), on 12th November, adhered.

The pursuers appealed.

The cause was heard originally before a Court consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) Clubs such as the present were, with respect to property, midway between incorporated companies and ordinary partnerships. A club had no proper corporate existence, and therefore the property, which could not be in pendente, must be in the individual members; but the individual members were not in the ordinary sense proprietors, their right terminated absolutely with their membership; they could transmit nothing, their creditors could attach nothing, and conversely the direct authority of each individual must be proved to infer his liability for the debts of the club.[1] Nevertheless, each member had such a contingent right of property in the assets of the club (as realised in the event of its dissolution) as entitled him to object to the disposal of the property of the club in a manner not reasonably incidental to the purposes for which the club existed. In short, the members were joint proprietors, and like ordinary joint proprietors[2] unanimity was the rule with respect to the disposal of the property of the club. No doubt, as in the case of an incorporated company,[3] a majority of a club, or of its managing committee or directors, might dispose of the property for the purposes of the company, but it was ultra vires of an incorporation to alienate the assets of the incorporation, in whole or in part, without consideration,—that was to say, as a gift—even although the gift might indirectly result in the pecuniary benefit of the corporation.[4] That rule applied here. (2) Even if the gift of the cup was not absolutely ultra vires—so as to require the consent of every member of the club—the majority necessary was a majority of the whole members of the club,[5] and the defender did not aver that such a majority had consented. (3) Further, assuming that a majority of the members present at a meeting duly summoned was sufficient, the gift was not effectual without delivery. The bare resolution of the club was not sufficient to convert the defender's possession of the cup as custodier on behalf of the club into possession on his own account. The resolution to make the gift (assuming it to be effectual otherwise) had been validly rescinded therefore at the meeting on 2d February 1894.

Argued for the defender;—The arguments derived from the law of incorporations, and the law of common property, had no real application here. This club was certainly not an incorporation, and its members were certainly not, in the ordinary sense of the term, proprietors of the cup. The proprietory title, no doubt, might be in them, but not the proprietory interest. In effect they were just trustees; and the real question was whether the presentation of the cup to the defender was outwith the purposes of the club. It was not. The purpose of the club was to promote curling, and to this end to give prizes to successful curlers. Did it make any difference that the prize, instead of being announced beforehand, was resolved on only after the competition, and consisted of a trophy which had been won for the club largely through the skill of the person to whom it was to be presented? Such a presentation might be called a gift, but it was nevertheless a perfectly reasonable, and therefore legal, act on the part of the members of a club whose object was the promotion of sport, and not the pecuniary profit of its members. No doubt there might be dispositions of the property of such a club which were ultra vires. But the Court would not readily reach the conclusion that a presentation which was approved by a majority of the members of the club, and was in fact a recognition of skill in the particular sport favoured by the club, was an act which was ultra vires. (2) Of course if the requisite majority had not assented to the presentation that was another matter. But there was nothing to suggest that a simple majority of the members present at a meeting duly summoned was not sufficient. (3) If the resolution to give the cup was per se valid, it had not been effectually rescinded. The defender had possession of the cup, so that formal presentation, which might be a proper enough ceremonial, was not essential as a matter of legal solemnity.

The Court made avizandum on 16th January 1896. Thereafter in the following summer session, the case was further heard before the same learned Judges, together with Lord Moncreiff.

At the second hearing the arguments formerly maintained were resumed, and it was suggested from the bench that argument should also be offered on the questions,—(1) Whether it was within the competency of the Court to determine as to the destination of a sporting trophy; and (2) Whether Sir Sydney Waterlow had ever been divested of the property of the cup. On the former of these questions the pursuers maintained that the question was within the competency of the Court,[1] and on the latter that Sir Sydney Waterlow had been divested. The defender stated that he did not desire to argue to the contrary on either question.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers and defenders are not at variance as to any of the material facts of the case. In 1869 Sir Sydney Waterlow presented a cup for competition by the curlers of the county of Dumfries. It was presented as a challenge cup, but one of the conditions—as engraved upon the cup itself—was that "the winner for three consecutive years" was "to keep the cup." The rules for competition were adjusted by representatives of the various clubs in the county, and approved of by Sir Sydney Waterlow, and some alterations were made several years ago, which were adjusted by all the competing clubs, Sir Sydney Waterlow declaring himself satisfied with any rules adjusted by them. Each club, in order to compete, required to send to the competition "not less than one-half of their rinks of four players each," and no club could compete unless it sent at least three rinks to the competition, twelve players being thus necessary to enable any club to compete. The following rule was one of those adjusted and acted on,—"The club which has gained the highest number of shots per rink shall be the winners, and the skip of the highest winning rink from the winning club shall be the holder of the cup till next match. The cup shall become the property of the club winning twice in succession or thrice in all." Under this latter part of the rule the Upper Annandale Club became successful in winning the cup finally, and it is common ground between the pursuers and the defenders that the cup became the property of the club, and was so at the time of the transaction which has led to the present proceedings.

The question which has arisen in this case is, whether the Upper Annandale Club having become the owners of the cup, a majority of the club, at a meeting convened "to decide as to the disposal of the Waterlow Cup," had the power, against the objection of a minority of members of the club, to part with the property, and to make a gift of it to an individual, handing over the cup to him as his absolute property. It appears that an actual majority of the whole members of the club afterwards passed a resolution to rescind the gift. Both the Sheriffs have considered this matter, and hold that the gift made could not be rescinded. I do not think it is necessary to consider whether this could be done or not, assuming that the action of the majority of the first meeting in making a gift of the cup was not ultra vires, as I think that the case can be decided on the question of the right of the majority to make the gift against the objections of the minority.

The opinion I have come to is that this cup having come to form part of the property of the club, having been won as a prize by the club, members of the club are entitled to object to its being gifted away without their consent, and to insist upon its being restored to the possession of the club. It may be that this cup is of no great intrinsic value. As to that we have no information, but it may also be, and probably is, of considerable value. Such property, often of great value, won in a similar manner and under similar rules, is held by many clubs and associations throughout the country. Such trophies may be held, after being finally won by one competing club, either as trophies without their being used as competition challenge prizes within the club, or they may be—as was proposed to be done here—used in the club competitions as challenge prizes. Every member of the club has an interest in them, and is, I think, entitled to object to their being alienated at the will of a majority. I hold that a majority cannot insist on acting for the club, and doing such an act in name of the club, so as to bind unwilling members. The subject in question is not their property to dispose of, but is only their property along with others, in respect of membership of the club. And there is nothing in the constitution of the club giving such power.

I cannot but express my regret that such a question should have been brought before a Court of law, but as it has come before this Court, and a judgment is insisted on, there is no alternative but to deal with it, and I think we must do so by recalling the judgments of the Sheriffs and pronouncing a decree for delivery.

Murray v. Johnstone.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree in thinking that this is a deplorable litigation. Two questions are raised in the case—(1) Has this cup been won by the Upper Annandale Curling Club so as to entitle them to keep it according to the rules of the game of curling, and the terms upon which it was presented for competition? and (2) If the cup has been won by the club, have they validly made a gift of it to the skip of their highest winning rink at the competition?

The case has been dealt with by both of the Sheriffs on the assumption that the cup was won by the Upper Annandale Curling Club, and that they were the owners of it. The only question considered by them was whether the cup had been validly gifted to the defender. Both Sheriffs are of opinion that the cup was validly gifted to the defender, and they therefore decided the case in his favour, and held that he was entitled to keep the cup.

I therefore, in the first place, address myself to the question whether the decision of the Sheriffs on this matter is right or not, and I may say at once that I am of opinion that it is. In my judgment the cup was validly presented by the club to the defender, and no revocation of the gift could be made at any subsequent meeting of the club. It was maintained to us by the pursuers that the law of common property applies to this case. In my opinion the law of common property is almost ridiculously inapplicable. The idea of the law of common property applying to the money or the furniture in possession of the officers of a club is, I think, extravagant on the face of it. No club could be carried on on such a footing. This club, I suppose, has no property except the annual subscription of half-a-crown from each of its members. I suppose it would be contended that in accordance with the maxim melior est conditio prohibentis if one member objects no use can be made of these half-crowns—that not one penny of them could be spent if a single member objects, because of the law of common property and the maxim melior est conditio prohibentis. I do not mean to say that the Courts of law would not restrain members of a club who were dealing corruptly or improperly with the property of the club, but that has nothing to do with the law of common property, and I do not understand that in the present case our opinion is asked upon any question of corrupt or improper conduct. A meeting of the club was held to consider whether the cup should be presented to the skip of the winning rink; a majority of the meeting considered that it should, and the only objection to presenting it is that the law of common property applies. The law of common property applies no more to this cup than to a box of cigars or a dozen of champagne presented as a club prize. Or suppose a meeting of a club was held to consider whether £50 should be given to the Royal Infirmary. One member objects. Melior est conditio prohibentis. Is the gift therefore invalid? This would be extravagant. I think that you are in an entirely different department and region from that which is regulated by the law of common property. I am therefore of opinion with the Sheriffs that what was done was legal, and that if the cup was the property of the club they validly presented it to the defender.

But I desire to state an objection which occurred to me, and was argued, I think, mainly on my suggestion, although I do not now press it.

No. 186.

July 8, 1896. Murray v. Johnstone.

This cup was presented by Sir Sydney Waterlow in 1869, upwards of a quarter of a century ago, to the curling clubs of the county of Dumfries. Now, to whom did he present it? What are the curling clubs of the county of Dumfries? Are their numbers fixed? I put these questions, but nobody seemed to know. To whom did Sir Sydney Waterlow give the cup? Nobody knows. It is not suggested that he presented it to a trustee or a body of trustees. Then it is said that rules were originally framed to regulate the competition. Who framed them? Again the answer is, "We do not know." The rules to be effectual would require to be made by representatives of the various clubs and to be approved by Sir Sydney Waterlow. There is no evidence to that effect. The statements made by the pursuers that the cup was won by the Upper Annandale Curling Club, and that the cup is in the possession of the defender, are admitted by the latter, but quoad ultra "not known, and not admitted." In these circumstances where there is no evidence to shew that the cup ever passed from Sir Sydney Waterlow, it seems to me that he is the proper person to settle this dispute, and to decide who is entitled to the cup—that he is the only proper person. That would end the unseemly litigation in this Court. I do not think it is seemly for this Court to determine as to the winning of a sporting cup or a box of cigars or a gallon of brandy, and we should refrain as far as we with propriety can from interfering in a matter of the kind.

Although I have adverted to this as in my opinion a good reason for our not determining the matter, I am quite willing to decide the case on the ground taken by the Sheriffs, that, at a meeting of the club properly called, the cup was presented to the skip. I agree with the Sheriffs that there was no illegality in this, and no impropriety on account of which we can interfere. If the cup was legally presented, it was impossible for the club to change their mind and revoke the gift.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am unable to regard this case in any aspect of it as one of importance, and I should have been glad if the parties had seen their way to settle their differences otherwise than by an appeal to the Courts of law. I cannot speak in commendation of the conduct of either party. The pursuers might very well, on the one hand, have been content to acquiesce in what was done by a majority of the members of their club present at a meeting specially called to consider and determine as to the disposal of the cup in question; on the other hand, the defender would have taken a course worthier of himself if he had declined to take the cup, seeing that a very considerable number of the members (I believe a majority of them) objected to its being given to him. But as the parties stand upon their legal rights, and ask to have the case determined by a Court of law, I think we are bound to decide the question submitted to us, and that question, as it appears to me, is not a question of sport; it has nothing to do with the rules under which the cup was competed for, or the fairness with which the competition was conducted; it is neither more nor less than a question of property.

It has been suggested that the property of the cup is or may be still vested in the original donor. I cannot take that view. I think his right of property ceased when he handed over the cup to the person to whom he gave or sent it, to be held for the benefit of the successful competitors. It was then a delivered gift, and the donor could not recall it. It was no longer his. But as between the parties to this case no such question is raised. It is admitted that the cup was won by the club, and it is at this stage that we are alone concerned with any question of property in it. The club having won the cup, and having thus become the owners of it, could the club by a majority, and against the wishes of the minority, make a donation of the cup to one of its members or to a stranger? That appears to me to be the only question raised by this appeal, and viewing the case in that light, I have felt no difficulty in disposing of it. The cup is the property of the club, but the club not being a corporation cannot hold any property apart from its constituent members. The cup is therefore the property of the members of the club. Each member of the club has as much right and interest in the cup as another. It is quite true that each member has that right only so long as he remains a member, and cannot, even during his membership, sell or transfer his interest. But so long as he remains a member he has a joint right with all other members in everything that belongs in property to the club. This view of the rights of a member of a club is not without authority, some of which were cited at the debate. If I am right so far, I think the question is solved. No one can be deprived of his property except by his consent or by the action of the law, and consequently the majority of the members of this club cannot deprive the minority of what belongs to them. Had it been a question of administration of the property or assets of the club, it would have been a different matter. But it is not administration, it is alienation.

Had I been of opinion that the club by a majority of its members was entitled to give this cup away, I should have agreed with the Sheriff that the resolution passed at the meeting of 16th November 1893 was conclusive, and could not have been gone back upon. But I think the resolution come to at that meeting by a majority was ultra vires, and not binding on the club. I think therefore that the interlocutors appealed against should be recalled, and decree granted in terms of the first conclusion in the prayer of the petition.

LORD MONCREIFF.—This case was argued and decided in the Sheriff Court on the assumption that the cup presented by Sir Sydney Waterlow in 1869 was finally won by, and became the property of, the Upper Annandale Curling Club in 1893. That the cup had become the property of the club is one of the findings in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute which the defender asks us to affirm, and I do not think we should go back on that finding, which, so far as I am able to judge, is in accordance with the truth of the case. Whatever may be the true meaning of the conditions under which the gift was made and held, the donor could not and never desired to revoke it. During the twenty-four years between 1869 and 1893 he left it to the competing clubs to regulate the competition. It is not for the defender to object to the regulations under which the cup was played for. He was a member of the Upper Annandale Club. He played for the cup as skip of one of the rinks of that club, and it must be held that he did so in knowledge of and under the rules and regulations which governed the competitions. He as an individual did not in any view win the cup; the successful rink won it, and won it as I hold for their club.

The cup having thus become the property of the Upper Annandale Club, the next question is, whether it was effectually gifted to the defender under a resolution passed by a majority of the club. It would have been a handsome act if the club had unanimously voted for giving the cup to the defender. He was skip of the winning rink for two of the years in which it was won for the club, and as probably the club did not possess any local habitation in which to keep it, it was not unreasonable that it should be given to the defender if that course were legal. But the question is, had a majority the power to do so against the wishes of a substantial minority?

I am of opinion that it was beyond the powers of a majority of the club to alienate the trophy. The cup was the common property of all the members although it was won for the club by the exertions of individual members. And although, as I have said, it would in the circumstances have been a graceful act to give it to the defender, it is not surprising that some members of the club, especially those other than the defender who played in the winning rinks in 1887, 1891, and 1893, should prefer that the cup should remain as evidence of their success, and not pass as his absolute property into the hands of an individual member who might any day cease to be a member of the club.

The law of common property is most familiar to us in relation to heritable subjects. The application of the law to moveable subjects is not so well defined or illustrated by decision. But I see no reason to think that in principle the law is not the same. In the case of heritable subjects, while the general rule is that any one proprietor can prevent any extraordinary use of the subject, or alterations upon its conditions, without his consent, there is an exception to the rule, viz., that necessary operations in rebuilding or repairing cannot be so prevented, and if all parties cannot agree, the will of the majority rules. So in regard to moveables, anything necessary for, and properly incidental to, the purposes of the joint proprietorship may be done by a majority.

The right of a member of a club (not proprietary) in the property of the club is of a peculiar description. While the club exists as a going concern, he is not entitled to insist on a sale and a division of the price. When he dies, his right, such as it is, does not pass to his representatives, and if he retires from the club his whole interest therein ceases. But as long as he remains a member of the club his right is one of common property.

The test whether in any particular case the disposal of club property by a committee or by a majority of members is or is not ultra vires is to inquire whether the proposed use or disposal of the article or fund is incidental to the purposes and proper management of the association. If it is not, a resolution so to dispose of it will not be sustained. In the present case if they had merely resolved that the cup should be held for the club by the defender as long as he remained a member, the resolution might have been justified as a reasonable act of management. But what is proposed is to alienate the club's property, and this I think cannot be done by the vote of the majority.

In the course of the argument it was urged that in this view it would be illegal for a majority of the members of a club to make a present out of the club funds to a secretary on his retiring, or to an old servant, or to present a medal or other prize to a member. Such a question seldom, if ever, arises. If the gift proposed is substantial, it is usually made or eked out by private subscription among the members. If it is trifling, nobody objects. But if objection were taken by a minority, each case would depend upon its own circumstances, and fall to be decided according as the gift was or was not fairly authorised by the constitution and purposes of the club. Here what is proposed to be done is not to buy a prize or souvenir for the defender, but to present him with a valuable trophy, which was presented to the club as a body and intended to remain its property.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the appeal should be sustained, and that the defender should be ordained to deliver up the cup to the pursuers.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor appealed against: Ordain the defender to deliver to Mr John Young, secretary of the Upper Annandale Curling Club the silver trophy known as the 'Waterlow Cup,' the property of the club, which was handed over to the defender as custodier for the club for the season 1893-94, within twenty-one days from the date hereof, and decern."

Process—Petition for reconstitution of District Fishery Board—Intimation.—Petition for the reconstitution of a lapsed district fishery board ordered to be intimated on the walls and in the Minute-book, and to the Secretary for Scotland, and to be advertised in certain newspapers.

1ST DIVISION.

THE Duke of Argyll and others, being the upper and lower proprietors of salmon fishings within the district of the Rivers Baa and Glencoilleadar, Mull, qualified in terms of the 18th section of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, presented this petition to the Court in order to have the district board of the district reconstituted. After being constituted, the board had lapsed through the failure of its clerk to call a meeting of proprietors before 3d December 1873, being three years from the date at which the first board assumed office, for the election of a board for the next three years.

The prayer of the petition contained no crave for an order for intimation or advertisement.

The petitioner argued;—There was no necessity for any intimation of the petition, the statute [1] authorising the Sheriff de plano to proceed. It was not the practice of the Court to order any intimation.[2] [The Lord President suggested that the petition should be intimated to the Secretary for Scotland and should be advertised.] There was no objection to the petition being intimated to the Secretary for Scotland and advertised.

THE COURT appointed the petition "to be intimated on the walls and in the Minute-book in common form, and also to Her Majesty's Secretary for Scotland, and to be advertised once in each of the Scotsman, Glasgow Herald, and Oban Times newspapers," and appointed his Lordship and all parties interested, if so advised, to lodge answers within eight days.

Process—"All parties not called"—Feu with minerals reserved to granter—Lease of minerals—Damage caused to feu by working of minerals—Action by feuar against granter.—A granted a feu of certain subjects, reserving the minerals, and afterwards leased the minerals. Injury having subsequently been occasioned to the surface of the feu by the workings of the mineral tenants, the feuar raised an action of damages against A. The defender, averring that the injury was due solely to the fault of the mineral tenants, pleaded, "All parties not called."

Held (rev. the judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling), that the pursuer was entitled to proceed with his action without calling the mineral tenants.

1ST DIVISION. Ld Stormonth-Darling.

By feu-contract dated July 1872, the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of the burgh of Paisley, as representing the community of the burgh, granted to Messrs Hugh Highgate & Company, oil refiners, Paisley, a feu of certain subjects in Murray Street, Paisley, —"But reserving always to the said" granters "and their successors and assignees the whole coal and other metals and minerals within the said steading of ground, and power to work, win, and carry away the same, but not to occupy the surface."

The feu-contract further contained a clause to the effect that the feuars should be bound within two years from the date of entry to erect and maintain upon the subjects buildings capable of yielding a yearly rental of at least triple the feu-duty to be paid.

In terms of the conditions buildings were erected on the subjects, and were used thereafter by the feuars for the purposes of their business.

By lease dated September 1885 the Corporation of Paisley let to Alexander Spiers, fireclay goods manufacturer in Paisley, and John Faill, as trustees for the firm of Spiers, Gibb, & Company, the fireclay under the ground which had been feued to the Messrs Highgate. Under this lease the lessees were taken bound to relieve the corporation of all damage caused by their operations in working the fireclay, and stringent regulations were laid down as to the method of working.

Subsidences having taken place on the lands occupied by the Messrs Highgate in consequence of the working of the fireclay, they, on 17th February 1896, raised this action against the Corporation of Paisley for declarator (1) that the defenders were not entitled either by themselves or by their lessees to work the minerals under their feu in such manner as to cause subsidence; (2) that they were bound to give support to the solum of the pursuers' lands, and to restore the buildings, &c., upon them to the state in which they were before the occurrence of the subsidence; (3) for damages in respect of the injury caused thereby; and lastly for interdict against future workings.

The defenders averred that the subsidences had been caused by the fault of their mineral tenants, and that they had raised an action (referred to by the Lord Ordinary in his note) against the latter, in which their improper working was set forth. "The defenders took all proper and competent steps to see that the provisions of the lease were observed, and having done that, they are not liable to the pursuers for any damage that may have resulted to them from the subsidence; in particular, they are not liable for the fault of their lessees."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) All parties interested not called.

On 29th May 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and continued the cause.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The defenders having feued the ground under reservation to themselves of the minerals, must be held to have warranted the surface of the subjects feued against improper mining either by themselves or by those authorised by them. They were accordingly solely liable, and it was therefore unnecessary to call the mineral tenants.[1] Alternatively, the pursuers had set forth fault against the defenders in this respect, and if they elected

* "OPINION.—The fuller discussion to which I listened in the cognate cases of Magistrates of Paisley v. Spiers, Gibb, & Co. has led me to reconsider the view which I was disposed to take (but to which I had not given effect by interlocutor) on the plea of 'All parties not called' in this case.

"The main defence of the Corporation is that the letting down of the surface is due to the fault of the lessees, and that for such fault they are not responsible. This defence makes it proper, I think, that the lessees should be called. As a general rule, a landlord is not liable for the consequences of his tenant's act or default unless it be the necessary result of the lease having been granted—Weston v. Incorporation of Tailors of Potterrow, July 10, 1839, 1 D. 1224; Lyons v. Anderson, June 25, 1886, 13 R. 1020. Nor is this rule affected by the circumstance that the pursuers here stand in the relation of vassals to the defenders. A superior who feus ground for building without special stipulation may not be entitled himself to do anything that will bring the buildings down, but he does not warrant support to his feuar against the illegal acts of all and sundry. Accordingly in the case of Tassie v. Magistrates of Glasgow, in 1 S. (June 18, 1822), where the pursuers were the tenants of the Corporation, and complained of operations by other tenants, the Magistrates were assoilzied and the actual wrongdoers were held liable.

"It appears from the defences of the mineral tenants to the action of relief at the instance of the Magistrates against them, that they mean to maintain that the subsidence was caused not by their operations but by the operations of their predecessors. It is right, I think, that they should have the chance of substantiating this defence, if they can, in the present action; otherwise the question might have to be tried over again in the action of relief.

"I shall therefore sustain the first plea in law for the defenders and continue the cause, in order to give the pursuers an opportunity, if so advised, of bringing a supplementary summons against the mineral tenants."

to take the risk of establishing it, they were not to be compelled to proceed against the mineral tenants, against whom they averred no fault. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary were inapplicable, as they dealt with damage by workings upon the surface of the ground.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no case in Scotland in which a superior had been found liable to the surface owner for damage caused by his mineral tenant having gone outside the obligations in the lease, unless the superior had explicitly bound himself to indemnify the surface owner against such damage.[1] The law of England was to the same effect.[2] The superior was not here bound to the feuar to uphold the surface. The reservation in his favour of the minerals certainly imported no such obligation. Accordingly, while he might be liable for any damage caused by himself, he was not liable for damage caused by the mineral tenants. It followed then that the latter must be called in this action.[3]

LORD PRESIDENT.—If this were a question of convenience or discretion, I should be at one with the Lord Ordinary. It, no doubt, would be very desirable that all the questions existing between the several parties concerned should be brought together, and the ultimate liability ascertained in one trial.

The question before us, however, is whether the pursuers are to be denied the right to go on with their present action as it stands, for this is the necessary result of sustaining the plea that all parties are not called. Now, the pursuers, rightly or wrongly, sue the defenders on the footing that they, and they only, were answerable to the pursuers in the matters alleged. The action cannot, at present, be assumed to be irrelevant, and I think that the pursuers have a right, if they so choose, to go on with their action. The result may shew that they are ill advised, but that is their concern.

I am for recalling the interlocutor, and remitting to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. The pursuers bring this action against the proprietors of the minerals under their lands, and the main ground of their action rests upon contractual relations between themselves and the defenders as granters of the right by which they hold the surface. There may or may not be a relevant case against these defenders on this or on other grounds, and there may or may not be a relevant case against the defenders' lessees. But a case against the lessees must be based upon some other ground than that alleged against the lessors. Now, I know of no rule of law by which the Court can compel the pursuer of an action which we must at present assume to be relevant, to bring another action against persons against whom he at present alleges no ground of complaint. It is impossible to say that the pursuers ought to bring such an action without determining beforehand that if they have a relevant case against the defenders they have called, they must also have a relevant case against the persons they have declined to call. That cannot be decided until the case has been heard on the merits. I see no reason to suppose that the defenders will be prejudiced by the failure to call their lessees, because the means for protecting their right of relief, if they have such a right, are in their own hands. On the other hand, the lessees, whom it is said the pursuers ought to call, cannot be prejudiced, since, whatever our decision may be, the question cannot, so far as concerns them, be res judicata. I accordingly see no good ground for refusing the pursuers the right to proceed against those persons whom they aver to be liable.

Mines and Minerals—Superior and Vassal—Reservation in feu-charter—Power to "search for and work out" coal—"Shank or open the ground"—"Close or garden."—A feu-charter, dated in 1728, contained a reservation in the granter's favour of the coal under the subjects feued, with power "to search for, work out, and dispose of the said coal, . . . and provided that, in searching for or working said coal, we doe not shank or open the ground within the house, office-houses, closs, or gardens to be built or made upon the said lands."

In 1895 a successor of the granter commenced boring operations at a spot which was within thirteen yards of one of the main entrances of the mansion-house built upon the feu, and which was situated in an artificially made and enclosed piece of ground laid out partly in grass and partly in flower beds. The bore was sunk in the part laid out in grass.

In a note of suspension and interdict presented by the feuar to have the boring operations interdicted, held (1) that "boring" was covered by the expression "opening the ground"; and (2) that the place where the operations were being carried on was a "closs or garden" in the sense of the charter, and was therefore within the prohibited area.

Opinion by Lord Kinnear, that even if "boring" did not fall within the expression "opening the ground," yet the right to bore being ancillary to and an incident of the right of "searching for and working" the coal, the respondent had no right to exercise it within an area where he was prohibited from searching for and working the coal.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Moncreiff.

IN October 1895 the Reverend Angus Macdonald, D.D., Roman Catholic Archbishop of St Andrews and Edinburgh, and others, the trustees for the Roman Catholic Church in the Archdiocese of St Andrews and Edinburgh, as heritable proprietors of the house and lands of Mount Vernon, situated at Liberton, near Edinburgh, presented to the Court a note of suspension and interdict against John Welsh, S.S.C., Edinburgh, the proprietor of the coal and minerals under Mount Vernon, and two other persons, in which the complainers prayed the Court to interdict the respondents . . . "from boring for coal or in any way opening the ground, and from depositing materials within or upon any portion of the close or gardens of the complainers' mansion-house of Mount Vernon . . . and in particular from boring, opening the ground, depositing materials or in any way trespassing within or upon the lawn opposite to the southern entrance of the said mansion-house; further, to ordain the respondents . . . to remove the boring machinery," &c., deposited by them upon the said lawn.

The lands of Mount Vernon were originally acquired by the complainers' predecessors by feu-charter granted to Joseph Cave by George, Lord Rosse, on 11th September 1728.

The granter reserved the coal of the lands disponed by the following reservation:—"But excepting and reserving always to me" the said George, Master of Ross, "and my heirs and successors the whole coall of the lands hereby disponed, and declaring that it shall be free leisum and lawfull to me and my foresaids to search for work out and dispose of the said coall, we always paying and satisfying all dammadges which the said Joseph Cave, or his said son, or his foresaids shall sustain thereby, and provided that in searching for or working said coall we doe not shank or open the ground within the house, office-houses, closs, or gardens to be built or made upon the said lands by the said Joseph Cave or his said son, or his foresaids, for their own proper dwelling."

In June 1895 the respondents had commenced to bore for coal at a spot within thirteen yards of one of the main entrances of the mansion-house of Mount Vernon.

The complainers averred that the place where the bore was being sunk was within the close or gardens of the mansion-house of Mount Vernon.

This was denied by the respondents, who also pleaded;—(4) The respondents being only restricted from "shanking or opening" the ground, the boring operations complained of do not constitute any infringement of that restriction.

The Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) granted interim interdict.

After a proof as to the history and character of the ground in which the respondents' borings were made, the import of which fully appears in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interim interdict formerly granted: Suspends the proceedings complained of; interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the respondents and each of them, or one or more of them, and all others acting by their authority, from boring for coal, opening the ground, depositing materials, or in any way trespassing within or upon the lawn opposite to the southern entrance of the said mansion-house: Ordains the respondents and each of them, or one or more of them, to remove the boring machinery, plant, and other articles deposited by the respondents, or one or other of them, upon the said lawn, and to restore the said ground to the state in which it was prior to the operations of the respondents thereon; quoad ultra refuses the prayer of the note." *

No. 189.

Macdonald v. Welsh.

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The operation of mineral "boring" was not covered by the excepting words of the feu-charter "shanking and opening" the ground. "Boring" was only pricking the surface, while "shanking" was sinking a shank or pit to reach and bring up minerals, and "opening the ground" was digging a trench and exposing the coal. (2) The operation was not within the prohibited area, as the place was not a "closs or garden." (3) The rights of the parties were defined by the feu-contract, and there was therefore no question arising under the general law of neighbourhood.

Argued for the complainers;—(1) The respondents were under the feu-charter taken bound to refrain from "shanking or opening the ground" within the prohibited area, not only in working the coal, but in "searching" for it. "Boring" was an operation which was clearly covered by the exception. (2) The place where the "boring" was being performed was also clearly within the prohibited area. It was a "garden," and was also within the precincts of the "closs." (3) In any view, the law of neighbourhood demanded that the respondents should exercise their rights of property without undue interference with their neighbours.

tion that the lands were bought for the purpose of erecting and making a dwelling-house, offices, and gardens.

"The respondents are now proprietors of the coal, and the complainers proprietors of the surface and other minerals. The respondents have recently proceeded to bore for coal at a spot within thirteen yards of one of the main entrances of the mansion-house. The complainers seek to have them interdicted from doing so, on the ground that they are within the excepted area; and the question which I have to decide is whether this is so or not.

"The history and character of the ground in which the borings complained of were made clearly appears from the proof and plan. The mansion-house of Mount Vernon has two main entrances, one to the north or front, and one to the south or back. The one to the back is not the servants' entrance; it is one of the main doors of the house, and some of the windows of the public rooms look to the south. Immediately to the south of the house a footpath runs parallel with the house; and on the farther side of the footpath is the piece of ground in question. It is about a quarter of an acre in extent, and has been made up and levelled probably in order to be used as a bowling-green. In former days, as now, such a piece of ground was an invariable adjunct to a country house. I should have explained that the green or lawn is surrounded by a fringe of shrubs and trees, among which flowers have been at one time planted, some of which survive. The whole enclosure is surrounded by an old holly hedge. There is no evidence that the ground was ever used except as pleasure ground, except that, when the house was unoccupied by the family, the caretaker seems to have used it as a washing-green for her own purposes. It is said at one time a line of cedars stood between the house and the bowling-green; and it is suggested that they were planted for the purpose of screening the house from the green. I think the truth is, that the cedars were planted for ornament, but, being rapidly growing plants, they grew so high as to darken the windows and obscure the view, and were accordingly cut down by Mr Lockhart Thomson's orders. Lastly, there is no evidence that, until recently, any flowers were ever planted on the bowling-green itself. There are flower beds on a similar plot of ground immediately to the east of the mansion-house; and, recently, one or two flower beds have been formed between the bowling-green and the footpath. The kitchen-garden and vineries, which are walled in, lie a little distance to the east. The green or lawn in question is quite different

LORD PRESIDENT.—My opinion on this case may be very briefly stated, but this does not at all imply that I deem the questions discussed before us at considerable length to be trivial or plain sailing.

I think that, by the operations complained of, the respondents "opened the ground within the gardens" in the sense of the title.

First, as to the operation, and then as to the place.

It is to be observed that the title prohibits opening the ground in searching as well as in working. Naturally, the opening in searching will be a less opening than the opening in working. Now, the operation of boring may require only a small aperture, but the object being to fetch up what is below the surface, an opening of some size is indispensable, and is, past all doubt, made by breaking the surface. On this simple medium I consider the operation to be within the prohibited acts.

As to the place, I think it is a garden. It is enclosed; it is artificially from the fields or paddocks to the north and south of the house, as to which there is no dispute.

"This being the description of the green or lawn in which the respondents claim right to bore, the question is whether it does or does not fall within the terms of the exception in the titles.

"The words within which this piece of ground must be brought are,—'The house, office-houses, closs, or gardens to be built or made on the said lands.' The plain object of the exception was to secure the privacy and comfort of the dwelling-house and its immediate precincts. It is quite plain that to permit boring or shanking at the spot in question would make residence in the house intolerable or impossible. At the same time, it is necessary to see whether the ground in question can, by reasonable construction, be brought within the terms of the exception. The words which are said to cover it are 'closs and gardens.' The Scotch word 'closs' rather suggests a yard enclosed by the offices or the wings of the mansion-house itself, or a back-yard enclosed with a wall. In England the word 'close' or 'curtilage' would probably cover a piece of ground like this, these words meaning and including a courtyard or a piece of ground lying near or belonging to a dwelling-house, such as a back-green or a strip of ground lying between the house and the street. There is a good deal to be said for the view that the piece of ground which I have described is so closely connected with the house as fitly to fall within the description of 'closs.' But it is unnecessary to decide this, because there is another word which perhaps more appropriately applies to the green, and that is the word 'gardens.' It is to be observed, and that is material, that the word is plural and not singular, and therefore I think it must be liberally construed as including all made and ornamental ground in the immediate vicinity of the house, which can fairly be held to come within that description. Now a garden is not necessarily composed entirely of flower beds; it is not complete without a certain extent of ground kept in grass. Indeed, some people instead of planting flowers prefer to keep the ground adjacent to the house entirely in grass. But it does not, I apprehend, for that reason, cease to be garden ground in a reasonable sense of the word. It requires as much trouble and expense, if not more, to keep it mown and in order.

"I therefore think that, giving a fair meaning to the terms of the exception, they must be held to cover the ground in question.

"In coming to this conclusion, I have not disregarded the contention that, in construing the exception, the word 'gardens' must not be taken in its widest signification. The 'gardens' referred to are not public gardens; formed; part is in grass and part in flower beds. The circumstance that the bore is in the part which is lawn does not take it out of the garden.

The Lord Ordinary has said all this with much more completeness, and accordingly I desire only to add that I entirely agree with him. I think his Lordship has rested his judgment on the right ground, and I do not go at all on the alternative argument of the complainers that, even if the bore were not in the expressly prohibited area, it might yet be interdicted on the ground that it was an undue interference with the comfort of the proprietors. I doubt whether such an argument is admissible where the title itself defines the area of protection.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree both that the grounds on which the question must be decided depend on the construction of the particular feu-charter and not on the general law of neighbourhood, and also on your Lordship's construction of the clause in the contract. I think, in the first place, that the area within which the operations complained of are being conducted is a "garden" within the meaning of the clause, and in the second place that these operations fall within the description of "opening" ground within the prohibited area.

But even if this last point were doubtful, I am not satisfied that the respondents have any title to execute operations within the protected area, They have no right of property in the surface of the ground, and such right as they do possess is accessory to their separate estate in the minerals, viz.,

and I think it must also be conceded that the owner of the surface could not, by laying out and planting flowers on the whole or a large part of the surface, exclude the owner of the coal. 'Gardens,' in the sense of the title, means gardens which are suitable and appropriate to a dwelling-house of the kind, and such I take the piece of ground in question to be.

"The respondents maintain that the exception does not apply to boring; that boring is not 'shanking' or 'opening the ground.' I do not think that this is a fair interpretation of the words as used. What the granter of the charter binds himself not to do is not to shank or open the ground within the excepted premises, not merely in working the coal, but also in searching for it; provided that, 'in searching for or working said coall we doe not shank or open the ground,' &c. Therefore, while the terms 'shanking' and 'opening the ground' may not usually be applied technically to boring, I think that the words as used in this deed are wide enough to cover, and do cover, boring.

"It is said that boring is a simple and inoffensive operation. It is not always so. If coal is not quickly struck, or if the ground is difficult, it may take several months, and cause much inconvenience by noise and the accumulation of rubbish. To conduct this operation within thirteen yards of the main-door of a house must plainly cause much discomfort and inconvenience to the inhabitants, if it does not render their occupation of the house impossible. I apprehend that it was to protect the owner of the house from such a disturbance that the exception was inserted in the feu-charter.

"In the view which I take it is not necessary to consider whether, assuming that the ground in question is not within the excepted area, the respondents did not act emulously in boring where they did.

"The result is that I shall interdict the respondents from boring, opening the ground, depositing materials, or trespassing within or upon what has been called the lawn or green in question opposite the south entrance of the mansion-house. The remainder of the prayer for interdict is too wide and indefinite."

to make such use of the surface as may be necessary for the purpose of enjoying their mineral estate. Accordingly they are entitled to "search for, work out, and dispose of" the coal, provided that in doing so they do not open the ground within the prohibited area. Now, there is no doubt that where they are entitled to open the ground for working the coal there they have a right to bore for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is workable coal. But the right of boring being ancillary to the right of searching for and working the coal, and an incident of it, I find no basis on any legal right for their claim to enter on the surface and bore at a place where they have no right to work.

MRS ISABELLA JAMESON OR GALBRAITH AND OTHERS, Defenders.

Superior and Vassal—Right in Security—Maills and Duties.—Held (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling, diss. Lord Young) that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security of a superiority, with an assignation to feu-duties and casualties, has no title to sue an action of maills and duties against the vassal of his debtor for recovery of the feu-duties.

2D DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

IN August 1895 the trustees of the late William Nelson, publisher in Edinburgh, as creditors under a bond and disposition in their favour (the debtors in which had been sequestrated), brought an action of maills and duties, the operative conclusions of which were directed against Mrs Isabella Jameson or Galbraith, as vassal in or proprietor of land at Kevock, near Lasswade, and as representing her former husband, the late Dr William Jameson, dentist, London, he having been at the time of his death vassal in or proprietor of the said lands, and against Miss Jean Tod as a vassal in or heritable creditor in possession of Kevockbank House, Lasswade, and garden adjoining thereto, in virtue of a decree of maills and duties in her favour, dated 22d November 1893.

The action arose in the following circumstances:—Among the subjects disponed in security by the bond on which the pursuers sued (which contained an assignation to rents, feu-duties, and casualties) was the superiority of a piece of land forming part of the lands of Kevockmill, Lasswade. This piece of land was feued out in 1827 for a feu-duty of £69, 15s. 9d., and at the date of the action had been subfeued in four portions as follow. The first portion was feued at a feu-duty of £12, and had been acquired by Mr John K. Milne; the second was feued at a feu-duty of £22, 17s. 10½d., and had been acquired by the North British Railway Company; the third, being that in respect of which the defender Miss Tod was sued, had been feued at a feu-duty of £12, and had been acquired by a Colonel Pullen, who had granted a bond and disposition in security over his feu, in respect of which Miss Tod was in possession under the decree of maills and duties referred to in the summons. The feu-duty of the remaining subfeu was £22, 17s. 10½d., and this subfeu had belonged to Dr Jameson, the former husband of Mrs Galbraith, the other defender.

The pursuers admitted that Milne's subfeu had been confirmed by the superior, and no question regarding it was raised in the action; but they averred that the three other subfeus had not been so confirmed, and they maintained that each of the portions held under these subfeus remained burdened with the whole original feu-duty, less the £12 allocated to Milne's subfeu. The North British Railway Company, however, were not called as defenders, and there was no conclusion inferring liability for the feu-duty, £22, 17s. 10½d., paid by them, the pursuers explaining that they had obtained decree against the railway company in another action of maills and duties. The summons of the present action concluded for decree against Mrs Jameson or Galbraith and Miss Tod, ordaining them "conjunctly and severally, or severally, to make payment to the pursuers of the maills and duties payable by them, in respect of their possession of the foresaid lands, subjects, and others, and that during their possession thereof respectively, with interest thereon at the rate of five per centum per annum from and after the respective terms at which the same have become or shall become due, and until paid, videlicet,—of the sum of £17, 8s. 11½d., being the feu-duty due and payable by them in respect of the said land at Kevock and Kevockbank House, and garden adjoining thereto, at the term of Martinmas 1894, for the half year preceding, and the like sum of £17, 8s. 11½d. due at the term of Whitsunday thereafter, and the like sum half-yearly thereafter, during their possession of the foresaid lands, with interest as aforesaid; at least of so much of the said feu-duties as will satisfy and pay the pursuers the balance" of £6000 remaining due under the bond sued on.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said balance of £6000 of the principal sum contained in the foresaid bond and disposition in security, with interest and penalty as condescended on, being justly due and resting owing to the pursuers, they are entitled to enter into possession of the said lands and others described in the said bond and disposition in security, and to draw the rents and duties thereof. (2) The defenders Mrs Isabella Currie or Jameson or Galbraith, and Jean Tod, being vassals in or proprietors of feus of portions of the said lands or others, or representing such vassals or proprietors, the pursuers are entitled to decree against them respectively for the maills and duties payable by them. (3) No valid allocation of the cumulo feu-duty having been made, except on the holding of Mr Milne, the defenders are liable in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

As regarded the defender Mrs Jameson or Galbraith, it appeared that both she and the heir of Dr Jameson had renounced the feu which had belonged to him, and the pursuers restricted the conclusions of the summons, in so far as directed against Mrs Jameson or Galbraith, to the conclusions against her as representing her former husband Dr Jameson, and did not ask for decree against her personally, and she allowed decree as restricted to pass against her.

Miss Tod lodged defences. She stated that she was willing to pay the feu-duty of £12 exigible under the subfeu, in respect of the subjects of which she was in possession, but she pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed.

July 9, 1896. Nelson's Trustees v. Tod.

On 27th May 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuers have no title to sue the action; therefore dismisses the action, and decerns," &c.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary was in error in holding that this case was ruled by the Prudential Insurance Company's[1] case. That was an action by the assignee to the arrears

* "OPINION.—I am of opinion that this case is governed by the case of Prudential Insurance Company v. Cheyne, 11 R. 871, which decided that neither a superior nor his assignee has any title to pursue an action of maills and duties for recovery of feu-duty. The ratio decidendi was that an action of maills and duties is one by which the pursuer seeks to enter into possession of a heritable subject, and that a superior is not entitled to possession so long as the feu subsists. He may irritate the feu, or he may have recourse to the action provided by the Act of 1874 as a substitute for a declarator of non-entry, but he cannot take possession by an action of maills and duties.

"The distinctions which the pursuer attempts to draw between that case and the present are—(1) That he is not the superior or the assignee of the superior, but a heritable creditor of the superior; and (2) that he is claiming not the rents of the subjects payable by tenants, but merely the feu-duty payable by the vassal. It does not seem to me that these are distinctions which affect the principle of the Prudential case.

"It is true that the heritable creditor of a proprietor may have a right of action not competent to the proprietor himself. Thus a creditor under a bond and disposition in security may bring an action of maills and duties while his author, the owner of the dominium utile, cannot. But that is because the latter does not require such an action to give him a title of possession. In the case of Scottish Heritable Security Company v. Allan, 3 R. 333, the late Lord President, at page 340, speaking of the pursuers in that case, who were disponees under an ex facie absolute disposition, said,—'They required no process of law to enable them to enter into possession, as it is called, and if they had proposed an action of maills and duties, for example, for the purpose of enabling them to uplift the rents, it would have been an idle formality, and, indeed, incompetent, because it is only an incumbrancer that requires to use a process of maills and duties in order to give him a title in a question with the tenant to uplift the rents.' Now, if the ratio decidendi in the Prudential case had been that a superior required no process of law to give him possession, I could have understood the analogy. But the ratio was that he had surrendered possession, and could not resume it, standing the feu-right.

"Neither can it matter that the pursuer, so far as his petitory conclusions go, asks only for feu-duty and not for rents. Equally he claims (as in his first plea in law) that he is 'entitled to enter into possession,' and that is a right which the Prudential case negatives.

"There is a real question between the parties, and there must, of course, be some competent mode of raising it, but this form of action, I think, is not. That question is, whether the compearing defender, who is and has been since 22d November 1893 in possession of one of four feus under a decree of maills and duties, is liable as such in the feu-duty of the whole four, so far as not allocated with consent of the superior. The defender has several answers to this demand, one of which is that the vassal in No. 4 (the condition of which gives rise to the question) has renounced his feu, and, consequently, that the relation of superior and vassal as regards that plot of ground no longer exists.

"I heard some argument on these various points, but it would be premature to express any opinion on them, if this be, as I think it is, an action which must be dismissed."

of certain feu-duties, and it was directed against the tenants of the vassals; this was an action by the heritable creditor of a superior with an assignation to feu-duties in his bond, and it was directed against the vassal, for Miss Tod, so long as she intromitted with the rents, was liable in payment of the feu-duty.[1] What the Prudential case decided was that, standing the feu, neither a superior nor anyone in his right, was entitled to derogate from the grant of the feu by drawing the rents of the vassal's tenants, and so entering into possession of the subjects which the superior had warranted to the vassal. Decree in the present action being an action not against the vassal's tenants, but against the vassal herself, would not derogate from the feu; the only effect of the decree would be that the vassal, instead of paying the feu-duty to the superior, would pay to the pursuers. No doubt the superior could not have brought an action of maills and duties against his vassals, but so neither could the granter of an ordinary bond and disposition of a dominium utile in security; yet the creditor in that case could bring such an action. There was a complete analogy between the disposition of a dominium utile in security with an assignation to the rents, and the disposition of a superiority in security with an assignation to the feu-duties; in each case the debtor assigned what he had a right and title to assign—the rents in the one case, and the feu-duties in the other—and the creditor's remedy in each case ought to be the same. If the present action was incompetent the pursuers had no continuing remedy for the recovery of the feu-duties, to which they had an undoubted right; their only remedy would be a series of petitory actions for the feu-duties as they accrued. There was nothing in principle adverse to the competency of the present action. The expression "maills and duties" included feu-duties.[2]

Argued for the defender;—It was admitted that a personal action for the feu-duties as they fell due would be competent against the defender. Her interest to have such an action instead of the present was that she would have a better defence to the claim for the whole feu-duty. Decree in an action of maills and duties by entitling the pursuers to enter into possession, would—at least it might be so held—entitle them to recover their whole feu-duty as a debitum fundi, whereas under a personal action they would be entitled to recover only so much of the feu-duty as the defender was personally liable for, i.e., that due for the portion of the subjects of which she was in possession. The present action could not be regarded as a personal action, but only as an action of maills and duties, and as such it was incompetent. The case was indistinguishable from the Prudential Company's case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case heritable creditors of a superior of certain lands ask for a decree of maills and duties for the recovery of feu-duties payable by the vassal. As stated in the debate, their purpose is to secure for themselves a standing order by which they may exact the feu-duties from time to time until the decree of maills and duties is removed, and thus save themselves from the necessity of repeated procedure. The question is whether they can competently make this demand, and that would seem to depend upon whether the superior himself could make it. Can a superior competently pursue such an action? Now, that question has been raised before, and has been decided in the case of The Prudential Insurance Company v. Cheyne's Trustees,[1] in which case the insurance company, as assignees of the superior, raised an action of maills and duties. The Court there held that the pursuers had no title to pursue such an action, and the principles and grounds laid down seem to me to be applicable to the present case, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there are no distinctions which should prevent its being held a precedent for the decision here. I would move your Lordships, therefore, to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD YOUNG.—I differed from the judgment to which your Lordship has referred, and I am bound to say that I still adhere to the grounds on which I differed and to the view which I then expressed. But if that case is a decision in point, and if, however inexpedient the result may be, it cannot be overcome except by Act of Parliament, it is a precedent and must be followed. But I think it right to say that in my opinion the view of the law taken in that case is incorrect.

If I understand the matter rightly it is this. The pursuers are the holders of a security title granted over an estate of superiority, with an assignation to feu-duties embodied therein. They have intimated their security title and their assignation to the feu-duties to the vassals. They are entitled to have the feu-duties paid to them by the vassals. That is not capable of being disputed. This action is called an action of maills and duties, but the name does not signify; its purpose is to have the vassals ordered to pay their feu-duties to the pursuers. The record indicates that there is an important question here, namely, whether the defender, who is in possession of part of the subjects as a creditor of one of the vassals, is liable only for the feu-duty which appertains to the part she occupies, or whether she is liable just as the vassal under a well-known rule of law is liable, not only for her own share but for the whole. That question will have to be decided in some competent action. But as regards this action I do not understand the objection which is taken at this stage by the defender. The pursuers have right to these feu-duties. I asked more than once what the defender thought the pursuers should do, and I was told they must proceed against the vassals annually. But if it will save trouble and expense to give them a decree once for all, why should they not have it? It will be less expensive and more expedient. What interest have they that there should be an action brought against them annually rather than that an action should be brought against them now which would settle the question altogether?

An action of maills and duties no doubt has important effects when brought by a creditor of the owner of the dominium utile, and certain technical effects follow upon it. But suppose this action is regarded not as an action of maills and duties, but simply as an action to have the vassals ordained to pay their feu-duties to the superior's creditor, as they are bound to do, then I do not see what technical difficulties there are; but even if there were technical difficulties, I should be prepared to overcome technical difficulties to save expense.

The question with the vassal's creditor to which I have referred must arise some time, and it would arise and would have to be determined in this action, if it were allowed to go on, just as well as in the first of the annual actions which it is suggested the pursuers should bring against the vassals.

I think this action is perfectly competent, and ought to be allowed to proceed. I cannot see any legitimate interest in any of the parties which requires that it should be dismissed at this stage.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the case of Cheyne[1] has decided this question, and has decided it adversely to the reclaimer. I am not disposed to go back on that decision, and therefore I agree that this reclaiming note must be refused.

Diligence refused, on the ground that such reports were confidential.

2D DIVISION.

MRS STUART, widow of Robert Stuart, farmer, Wraes, Aberdeenshire, and his pupil children, raised an action against the Great North of Scotland Railway Company for damages on account of his death. The pursuers averred that Mr Stuart died in consequence of injuries received by him on 12th October 1895 when about to enter a train at Gartly Station, on the defenders' line, and that these injuries were due to the fault of the defenders' servants in allowing the train to start before he was safely seated, and in inviting and ordering him to enter the train while it was in motion.

Notice of trial having been given for the summer sittings, the pursuers moved for a diligence to recover "the written reports made to the defenders by the stationmaster at Gartly Station, and by the guard and engine-driver of the 1.15 down train from Aberdeen to Huntly on 12th October last, with reference to the accident to the deceased Robert Stuart at Gartly Station caused by said train, and the time of its arrival at, and departure from, said station."

1ST DIVISION.

MICHAEL DAWSON, Glasgow, died on 20th February 1895, survived by his widow, Mrs Ann Cannon or Dawson, and by two daughters, Mrs Annie Wallace and Miss Catherine Dawson.

Mr Dawson left a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees for certain purposes. Inter alia, he directed the trustees to make payment to his widow of a free yearly alimentary annuity of £52, to make payment to his daughter, Mrs Wallace, of an alimentary annuity of five shillings a-week, and to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his daughter Catherine in liferent and her children in fee, whom failing the Archbishop and Chapter of the Roman Catholic Diocese of the Western District of Scotland in fee.

The net value of the estate left by Mr Dawson amounted to about £5992. The bulk of it, amounting to £5000, was deposited with the treasurer of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Glasgow upon the terms contained in the following deed of acknowledgment:—"Archdiocese of Glasgow.—Glasgow, 23d February 1892.—Received from Mr Michael Dawson, of 47 King Street, Glasgow, the sum of Five thousand pounds sterling (£5000), as a deposit for Mission purposes, to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas, and to be repaid on three months' notice." This document was subscribed across a penny stamp by Archbishop Eyre and the diocesan treasurer, and was indorsed as follows:—"The sum acknowledged on the other side has been allocated as follows to the undernoted Missions on loan, but Mr Dawson is to receive his interest half-yearly direct from the Diocesan Treasurer, who is also to repay him the capital when required on three months' notice. JOHN A. MAGUIRE, Diocesan Treasurer."

After the death of the testator the agents for the trustees sent to the agents for Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace a copy of the deed of acknowledgment, and on 17th April 1895 received intimation from their agents that Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace repudiated their provisions under the settlement, and claimed their legal rights in the testator's estate. The agents for the trustees, in acknowledging this intimation, pointed out that in their opinion the £5000 was such an investment as fell under the provisions of the Act 1661, c. 32, and that therefore the widow had no legal rights in it. The agents for Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace thereupon withdrew their intimation until the point had been considered, and the trustees in the circumstances consented to that being done. The agents for Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace then took the opinion of counsel, and after consideration on 5th August 1895 intimated that Mrs Wallace claimed her legal rights in her father's estate, and on 4th September 1895 they wrote in regard to the widow's claim a letter in the following terms:—"We have yours of yesterday, and we beg to intimate that Mrs Dawson will accept the provisions in her husband's settlement." Mrs Dawson, in accordance with this intimation, afterwards accepted payment of her provisions under the settlement so far as due.

Questions having arisen as to the amount of the sum of £5000 which fell into legitim fund, and as to whether Mrs Dawson was entitled to recall her election, a special case was presented for Mr Dawson's trustees, of the first part, Mrs Dawson, of the second part, Mrs Wallace, of the third part, and Miss Catherine Dawson, of the fourth part.

The questions submitted to the Court were,—"1. Whether the second party is entitled, on repaying to the first party the amounts received by her from them, with interest at five per cent per annum from the respective dates of payment, to claim her legal rights, or whether she is barred from claiming said rights? 2. Whether the said sum of £5000 is moveable as regards succession in a question between the first and second parties, and whether the second party is entitled to claim one-third thereof as jus relictæ? 3. Whether in fixing the legitim fund the division of said sum of £5000 is bipartite or tripartite?"

Argued for the fourth party;—(1) The widow was not entitled to recall her election. The election was express, after she had been duly warned by the agents of the trustees that there might be a question whether the £5000 was subject to the jus relictæ. Election was of the nature of a contract or quasi-contract, and could only be set aside on the ground of fraud or of essential error induced by a misrepresentation, whether innocent or not.[1] Here the widow had the fullest knowledge. (2) But it was not necessary to decide whether the widow was entitled to resile. She had no interest to do so, for the sum in question fell clearly within the Act 1661, c. 32. That resulted from the clause of interest.[2] The estate therefore fell to be divided between the trustees and children claiming legitim.

The argument for the third party was the same as the second branch of the argument for the fourth party.

Argued for the second party;—(1) Nothing had been done to bar the widow from recalling her election. The estate had not been distributed. No one would be prejudiced.[3] If, on reconsidering her position, she claimed her legal rights, the trustees should have definitely ascertained what were her rights and put these before her.[4] (2) The sum in question did not fall under the Act 1661, c. 32. In Downie's[2] case there was a formal mortgage. Here there was nothing but a receipt for money, analogous to a deposit-receipt. A deposit-receipt was clearly not within the Act.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The first question put to the Court in this case is, whether the widow of Mr Dawson is barred from claiming her legal rights. It appears that, shortly after the testator's death, she intimated to the trustees that she rejected the provisions in her favour, and claimed her legal rights; but that when it was pointed out to her that there might be a question whether a certain investment of £5000 was subject to the jus relictæ, she withdrew that intimation, and six months later, after she had obtained an opinion of counsel, she intimated that she accepted the provisions in her husband's settlement, and received payment of certain sums already due. This amounts to an express election. But if it were shewn that she acted under a false impression as to the relative value of her legal rights and her testamentary provisions, it may be that she might still reconsider her position and revert to her legal rights, because nothing has followed upon her election which might not easily be undone, so as to restore all parties to the same situation as if no benefit had been accepted under the will. But I think the only error suggested—for it is not explicitly set forth in the case—is that she may have been wrongly advised as to her interest in the sum of £5000 already mentioned, and it is therefore necessary to consider the question raised by the second query before determining the answer which should be made to the first.

The second question is whether the sum of £5000 is moveable as regards succession in a question between the first and second parties,—that is, between the testamentary trustees and the widow—and whether the second party, the widow, is entitled to claim one-third thereof as jus relictæ. That depends upon whether the fund in question is heritable or moveable, according to the law as it stood before the passing of the rescinded Act of 1641. At that date personal bonds with a clause of interest were supposed to constitute feuda pecuniæ, and were heritable quoad succession. The law was changed, first by the rescinded Act, and afterwards by the Act of 1661, cap. 32, which is now in force, and by which contracts and obligations for sums of money with clauses of interest are made moveable as to ordinary succession, but under this declaration, that "all such bonds, quoad fiscum, shall remain in the same condition as they were before the 16th of November 1641, nor shall any part thereof pertain to the relict jure relictæ, nor to the husband jure mariti." The question therefore is whether the document set forth in the 8th article of the case is a contract or obligation for money, which before 1641 must have been held as heritable. Now, it acknowledges receipt of a sum of £5000, to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent, and to be repaid on three months' notice. It has been determined by many decisions, and it is laid down as settled law by the institutional writers, that it is the payment of interest which fixes the heritable character of a personal bond. The case of Downie v. Christie [1] is directly in point, except in this one respect, that in that case the loan was for a period of time, and to bear interest periodically before the arrival of a fixed term of payment, whereas in the present case there is no fixed term of repayment, but the money is repayable on three months' notice. But that distinction makes no difference, because the old law was that where the term of payment of a bond was at a distant or uncertain date the bond was accounted heritable after the first term for payment of the interest, because the distance or the uncertainty of the term for payment of the principal afforded evidence that the creditor intended from the beginning to employ his money for a term of years together at interest. Whatever may be thought of the reason of this rule, according to the now established principles of law, the rule itself is fixed. These, like other personal bonds, are now moveable by statute; but the rights of the fisk and of widows are excluded from the operation of the Act. It follows that the second party has no more right to participate in the sum of £5000 in question than if it were still heritable to all intents and purposes; and that she was rightly advised if she made her election upon that assumption.

In these circumstances I presume that she has no interest to claim jus relictæ in place of the testamentary provisions in her favour. But I know of no authority for holding that any express election which has been partly carried into effect can be recalled at pleasure if it has been made, not in ignorance or error, but in full knowledge of the existence and value of the abandoned right in comparison with that which has been accepted. Therefore, if we were to answer the first question, I am unable to find in the statement of the case any state of facts which would enable us to decide it in the affirmative. In the view I take, however, of the question raised by the second query it would appear to me that the parties have no interest in the decision of the first, and therefore it is unnecessary to answer it.

The third question is whether, in fixing the legitim fund, "the division of the said sum of £5000 is bipartite or tripartite." As to that I entertain no doubt. The money is moveable as regards succession, for all purposes except the fisk and the jus relictæ. It follows that the executor and the children claiming legitim are entitled to share, and as no one else has a right to participate, the division must be an equal division between these two parties. The law is clearly stated by Mr Erskine,—"Personal bonds due to the husband, because by the Act 1661 they are moveable in respect of succession, and heritable as to the widow, must therefore increase the legitim and the dead's part, but not the jus relictæ." I am not aware that the law so laid down has ever been called in question, and I am therefore of opinion that we should answer the third question, that the division must be into two and not into three parts.

[1] 4 Macph. 1067, 38 Scot. Jur. 554.

No. 192.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with Lord Kinnear's opinion upon all the points, and I will only add, with reference to the construction of this old statute of the 17th century, that while it is true that the question as to the widow's rights is not a question under the statute, but is a question under the common law of Scotland which the statute left standing as regards the widow's rights, yet I venture to think that the terms of the statute are the best evidence that we have as to the rule of the common law at that time, which, in regard to the rights of the widow, remains unaltered. The statute is antecedent in date to the writings of our institutional writers, and it is reasonable to suppose that the remedy was co-extensive with the mischief intended to be put right. Now, the law which it was desired to correct was the law under which certain funds that are moveable in their own nature were considered to be heritable by reason of their running for a tract of future time to the effect of diminishing the fund divisible amongst the younger children. I think that the case where property which is now moveable in regard to the rights of the younger children, but heritable as regards the rights of the widow, is just the case described in the statute. Now, applying that description to the particular security with which we have to deal, it seems to me that this security completely answers the description, because it contains a promise to repay the capital, and also a clause of interest or annualrent. Our decision of course would have no application to receipts for money in the ordinary form, which never contain an obligement to pay the principal, and not usually a clause of interest, that being left to stand upon implication or separate agreement.

I agree that the questions should be answered in the way that has been suggested by Lord Kinnear.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT found it unnecessary to answer the first question; found in answer to the second question that the second party was not entitled to claim one-third of the sum of £5000 as jus relictæ; and found in answer to the third question that in fixing the legitim fund the division of the sum of £5000 was bipartite.

Galbraith & Moorhead v. Arethusa Ship Co., Limited.

GALBRAITH & MOORHEAD, Pursuers (Appellants).—Ure—Younger.
THE ARETHUSA SHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Balfour—Salvesen.

Contract—Agent and Principal—Shipbroker—Construction—Right of party to terminate agreement at pleasure.—A firm of brokers offered to take £500 in shares in the Arethusa Ship Company, "provided that we are appointed sole chartering brokers for the Arethusa, and that all her charters are to be done through us . . . it of course being always understood that we are able to do as well as any other brokers regarding rates and terms. . . ." The offer was accepted by the company. The brokers took the shares, and the agreement was acted on for several years. Held that the agreement was not terminable at the pleasure of the company.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

THIS was an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Renfrew and Bute at Greenock by Galbraith & Moorhead, shipbrokers in London, against the Arethusa Ship Company, Limited, concluding for £600 as damages for breach of contract.

The agreement in question was contained in the following letters passing between the pursuers and Macfarlane & Company, shipbrokers, Greenock, the managers of the Arethusa Ship Company:—1. Galbraith & Moorhead to Macfarlane & Company.—"9th Sept. 1891.—Dear Sirs,—Referring to previous interviews and correspondence, we now beg to say that we are prepared to take £500 in shares in the above company, provided that we are appointed sole chartering brokers for the 'Arethusa,' and that all her charters are to be done through us, the company paying us the usual brokerage of 1¼ per cent on each charter, it of course being always understood that we are able to do as well as any other brokers regarding rates and terms; also we are to have a line of insurance either on hull or freights of not less than £5000 p. voyage, of course also provided that we can do as well as other brokers; and we agree to return Messrs J. M. Macfarlane & Company half of our 5 per cent brokerage. We shall be glad to hear from you by return with your confirmation of this arrangement. Meantime, we remain, dear sirs, yours faithfully."

2. Macfarlane & Company to Galbraith & Moorhead.—"15th Sept. 1891.—Dear Sirs,—Yours to hand, contents noted, and we agree to your proposal to take £500 in this ship in terms of your favour of the 9th inst., which shall be held as the basis of our agreement. . . ."

The pursuers averred;—This agreement was acted on for some years; but lately a change took place in the management, and the defenders have, in breach of their agreement with the pursuers, failed to employ them as their sole chartering brokers.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant, and should be dismissed. (2) The defenders not being parties to said agreement, and the letters founded on not having been executed by them, they are not bound thereby, and have committed no breach, and should be assoilzied. (3) Et separatim, even assuming the defenders were made parties to said agreement by Messrs Macfarlane—(a) it being ultra vires, or in restraint of the company's liberty, was void; or (b) being terminable at any time, no action lies, and the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 21st January 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Henderson Begg) dismissed the action.*

* "NOTE.— . . . The opinion I have formed as to the true meaning of the letters founded on by the pursuers renders it unnecessary for me to decide more than the first of the pleas referred to. Under the agreement constituted by the letters of September 1891, the pursuers were appointed sole chartering brokers for the defenders' ship 'Arethusa,' and they aver that the agreement was acted on till lately, when a change took place in the management of the defenders' company. The new managers of the company have failed to employ the pursuers as their sole chartering brokers, and this is averred by the pursuers to be a breach of the agreement, entitling them to the damages sued for. Now, the agreement does not specify any terms of duration, and the pursuers maintain that it must therefore be construed as a perpetual agreement, subject only to such contingencies as would be sufficient in point of law to put an end to even an agreement for a fixed period (see Rhodes & Forwood, 4th May 1876, 1 App. Cases, 256, and Patmore & Company v. Cannon & Company, 14th July 1892, 19 R. 1004). But I do not know of any authority for the proposition that an agreement indefinite as to its duration is equivalent to a perpetual agreement, while authority to the contrary effect may, I think, be found in the cases of Dunlop & Company v. Steel & Company, 27th November 1879, 7 R. 283; Fifeshire Road Trustees v. Cowdenbeath Coal Company, 19th October 1883, 11 R. 18; and Cormack v. Keith & Murray, 15th July 1893, 20 R. 977. In the words of the late Lord President in the second of these cases, 'I do not think that the law recognises an agreement of this kind as perpetual; and where there is no term stated, the general rule is that either party may put an end to it, not on reasonable cause shewn, but on reasonable notice.' In the present case, the pursuers make no averments as to the defenders having failed to give reasonable notice. In the course of the debate before me, I offered the pursuers' procurator an opportunity of amending the record by the addition of such averments, but he declined the offer (quite rightly, I have no doubt), on the ground that any damages which he might so qualify would be too small to be worth suing for in the ordinary Sheriff Court."

* "NOTE.— . . . So far as I can judge, none of the three cases mentioned by the Sheriff-substitute rules the present case.

"The earliest of them—Dunlop & Company v. Steel & Company, 1879, 7 R. 283—was treated by the Court as a case having to do with a lease of water power, and there being no ish specified, the Court, applying a well-known principle in the law of leases, held the contract not to be binding.

"The contract in the second case—Fifeshire Road Trustees v. Cowdenbeath Coal Company, 1883, 11 R. 18—might perhaps have been treated as a contract of lease also, but the Court did not so treat it. They dealt with the case as one of the construction of an innominate contract. Two constructions of the deed in which the contract was embodied were possible. One was that the road trustees might at any time, or at least on reasonable notice, call for the removal of a railway which they had on certain conditions allowed the coal company to place across one of the roads under their charge, and the other was that they were not entitled to do so unless and until they were in a position to say that the public safety was being endangered, or that the public were being put to inconvenience. The presumption, as the Lord President stated, was in favour of the former of these two alternative views, and as the Court found nothing in the deed to redargue the presumption, they gave effect to it, Lord Shand pointing out that there were some considerations drawn from the deed itself which favoured the conclusion that the agreement was not meant to be perpetual, viz., that nothing in the shape of a grassum had been paid by the coal company for the privilege of having the railway where it was, and that there was no obligation placed upon the company to continue to use the railway or pay the wayleave.

"The remaining case is Cormack v. Keith & Murray, 1893, 20 R. 977, where a testator in his trust-settlement appointed A. B. to be agent to the Galbraith & Moorhead v. Arethusa Ship Co., Limited.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—There was no question of general law involved, but merely of the construction of a particular contract. The pursuers did not maintain, as the Sheriffs seemed to think, that the contract was in perpetuity. On the contrary, it was terminable in many events, e.g., the liquidation of the pursuers' company, the laying up of the ship owing to too low freights, the loss of the ship, or if the pursuers did not do as well as other brokers. The Sheriff had overlooked the clause in the agreement beginning, "it of course being always understood." That was sufficient to safeguard the defenders against the pursuers becoming lax in their efforts to find charters. It was a contract that the pursuers, other things being equal, should have a preference. The contention of the defenders was extravagant, for it came to this, that a week after the agreement was concluded they would have been entitled to terminate it at pleasure. The pursuers had given valuable consideration. The cases cited in the inferior Court had no bearing.

trust, and at the same time gave his trustees power to appoint law-agents, and where the Court held the trustees entitled to dispense with A. B.'s services when they saw fit, there being nothing in the deed to warrant the inference that the testator intended A. B.'s appointment to be a permanent one.

"From this summary, it will be seen that none of these cases is an authority for the broad proposition that where in a mutual contract, obviously intended to endure for some time, the period of duration is not expressly mentioned, the contract is, in the absence of any recognised usage, to be held to be terminable by either party on reasonable notice. Doubtless there is a presumption to that effect, but it is not a præsumptio juris et de jure. In every case the Court will proceed upon a construction of the document or documents constituting the agreement, and will give effect to the intention of the parties as gathered by clear or necessary implication from the terms in which they have expressed themselves.

"Is it, then, as the pursuers contend, a fair and reasonable inference to draw from their letter of 9th September 1891, which really contains the terms of the agreement now in question, that the agreement was to subsist, or in other words, the employment of the pursuers as chartering and insurance brokers for the 'Arethusa' was to continue till either the pursuers' firm was dissolved or the company was wound up? In support of their contention, the pursuers found strongly upon the fact that they gave substantial consideration for the appointment, inasmuch as they agreed to take, and did take, fifty £10 shares in the company, which, it was argued, they would not have been likely to do if the appointment had been terminable at any time, and they point to the clause,—'All her' (i.e., the 'Arethusa's) 'charters are to be done through us,' as shewing that the appointment was intended to be a permanent one. These considerations are certainly not without force, though, as regards the latter of them, it may be observed that it is a possible, though not perhaps the most natural, reading of the clause, to read it as if it ran—'All her charters during the continuance of this agreement,' an interpretation which would of course deprive the clause of all importance in its bearing upon the question now to be determined. There is, however, one consideration which is, as it seems to me, fatal to the view presented by the pursuers as to the inference deducible from the letter of 9th September 1891, and it is this, that, as I read the letter, the pursuers are not put under any obligation to exert themselves in the way of procuring charters for the vessel. If the remuneration mentioned in the letter became at any time, in their opinion, too small, or if for any reason they wished to get rid of the agreement, they would decline to take any trouble to obtain charters. In other words, they had it in their power to

Argued for the defenders;—This was a contract of service. It was against public policy that such a contract should be perpetual,[1] yet what the pursuers contended for was practically perpetuity. The Court would not regard such a contention with favour, or readily read into a contract such a term.[2] No sufficient consideration had been given for the imposition of such an obligation. Besides, the so-called consideration was really no consideration to the company. Other persons would have taken the shares if the pursuers had not. The Sheriff had rightly read the agreement as not taking the pursuers bound to exert themselves and do their best for the defenders.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The defenders' company was formed for the objects of purchasing, owning, and working the ship "Arethusa," and its operations were, by the memorandum of association, confined to that vessel. By the agreement, for breach of which this action is brought, the pursuers agreed to take £500 in shares of the company, provided they were appointed sole chartering brokers for the "Arethusa," and that all her charters were done through them, it being always understood that they were able to do as well as any other brokers regarding rates and terms.

The defenders claim right to "terminate the agreement at any time," and their way of doing so is simply by giving other brokers their charters, because they so please. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, on different grounds, have sustained this contention. I am unable to concur in this result, or in the reasoning of either Sheriff.

First of all, what is the fair reading of the agreement so far as duration goes? I think it means simply this: that, so long as the pursuers' firm are in business, and do as well as other brokers regarding rates and terms, they shall get the "Arethusa's" charters. To call this a perpetual contract is surely inaccurate. The conditions are the continued existence of the "Arethusa" and of the pursuers' firm, and also the getting by them of as good rates and terms as other brokers get. The life of a ship is very far from a perpetuity; the joint lives of a ship and a firm of brokers still farther; while the condition about rates and terms still more reduces the stability of the tenure. When the employment, such as it is, is the counterpart for a substantial contribution of capital, the arrangement does not seem to call for remark or to warrant any reluctance in treating a breach of it as a breach of contract.

Accordingly, I do not agree with the Sheriff-substitute in considering this terminate at any time the relation constituted by the agreement, and that being so, it appears to me that it would require clearer indicia than are to be found within the four corners of the letters founded on to warrant the conclusion that the company meant to come under an obligation to employ the pursuers as their chartering and insurance brokers during the period of their joint existence.

"Accordingly, while I feel more difficulty about the case than the Sheriff-substitute appears to have felt, I feel obliged to concur in the result at which he has arrived. . . ."

contract to be indefinite in its duration, and (agreeing here with the Sheriff) I do not think that the cases cited by the Sheriff-substitute rule the present case, or indeed have the general application which he ascribes to them. On the other hand, I am unable to regard the absence of an obligation on the defenders to exert themselves in the way of procuring charters for the vessel as of decisive importance. I should have thought this necessarily implied. And yet this is the circumstance which has determined the decision of the Sheriff.

If the construction which I put on the contract be sound, there is, so far as I know, no rule of law which refuses it effect. There is nothing illegal in a trader engaging to give all his business, so long as he carries it on, to a broker, for any consideration he likes, if a contract to this effect be made in writing. Again, no valid argument, indeed no argument at all, was offered us to the effect that this "Arethusa Ship Company, Limited," could not enter into such a contract; if an individual could, and if the company could, then the "managers" could, for the "managers" have the most absolute power to do everything competent to the company except what is expressly reserved for general meetings (an exception which, of course, has no application to the present question).

I think that the first and third pleas of the defenders should be repelled, and the case remitted to the Sheriff to allow a proof, and to proceed. It would, I think, be premature to dispose of the defenders' second plea until the facts are ascertained, although this does not imply any undue appreciation of its importance on averment.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with the Sheriff that this case depends solely upon the construction of the agreement contained in the letter of 9th September 1891, by which the pursuers were appointed sole chartering brokers for the "Arethusa," and the question is, whether that agreement could be determined by the defenders on reasonable notice, or on reasonable cause only. Now, it will be observed that the pursuers paid for the appointment of sole charterer's brokers, and the consideration was their taking £500 in shares of the company, which it is not disputed they did. I have great difficulty in holding that an agreement for which consideration had been thus given could be terminated at will by the other contracting party.

I observe that the Sheriff says this:—"There is, however, one consideration which is, as it seems to me, fatal to the view presented by the pursuers, and it is this, that, as I read their letter, the pursuers are not put under any obligation to exert themselves in the way of procuring charters for the vessel." I think the Sheriff is wrong in this, because the agreement bears to be entered into "on the understanding" that the pursuers are able to do as well as any other brokers regarding rates and terms. I suppose the pursuers could not do as well as any other brokers unless they exerted themselves to get charters, and that is equivalent to saying that if the pursuers do not exert themselves in procuring good charters for the vessel, the defenders would be entitled to put an end to the agreement.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the agreement was not terminable at the will of the defenders, but only on cause shewn.

contained in the following deed of acknowledgment:—"Archdiocese of Glasgow.—Glasgow, 23d February 1892.—Received from Mr Michael Dawson, of 47 King Street, Glasgow, the sum of Five thousand pounds sterling (£5000), as a deposit for Mission purposes, to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas, and to be repaid on three months' notice." This document was subscribed across a penny stamp by Archbishop Eyre and the diocesan treasurer, and was indorsed as follows:—"The sum acknowledged on the other side has been allocated as follows to the undernoted Missions on loan, but Mr Dawson is to receive his interest half-yearly direct from the Diocesan Treasurer, who is also to repay him the capital when required on three months' notice. JOHN A. MAGUIRE, Diocesan Treasurer."

After the death of the testator the agents for the trustees sent to the agents for Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace a copy of the deed of acknowledgment, and on 17th April 1895 received intimation from their agents that Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace repudiated their provisions under the settlement, and claimed their legal rights in the testator's estate. The agents for the trustees, in acknowledging this intimation, pointed out that in their opinion the £5000 was such an investment as fell under the provisions of the Act 1661, c. 32, and that therefore the widow had no legal rights in it. The agents for Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace thereupon withdrew their intimation until the point had been considered, and the trustees in the circumstances consented to that being done. The agents for Mrs Dawson and Mrs Wallace then took the opinion of counsel, and after consideration on 5th August 1895 intimated that Mrs Wallace claimed her legal rights in her father's estate, and on 4th September 1895 they wrote in regard to the widow's claim a letter in the following terms:—"We have yours of yesterday, and we beg to intimate that Mrs Dawson will accept the provisions in her husband's settlement." Mrs Dawson, in accordance with this intimation, afterwards accepted payment of her provisions under the settlement so far as due.

Questions having arisen as to the amount of the sum of £5000 which fell into legitim fund, and as to whether Mrs Dawson was entitled to recall her election, a special case was presented for Mr Dawson's trustees, of the first part, Mrs Dawson, of the second part, Mrs Wallace, of the third part, and Miss Catherine Dawson, of the fourth part.

The questions submitted to the Court were,—"1. Whether the second party is entitled, on repaying to the first party the amounts received by her from them, with interest at five per cent per annum from the respective dates of payment, to claim her legal rights, or whether she is barred from claiming said rights? 2. Whether the said sum of £5000 is moveable as regards succession in a question between the first and second parties, and whether the second party is entitled to claim one-third thereof as jus relictæ? 3. Whether in fixing the legitim fund the division of said sum of £5000 is bipartite or tripartite?"

Argued for the fourth party;—(1) The widow was not entitled to recall her election. The election was express, after she had been duly warned by the agents of the trustees that there might be a question whether the £5000 was subject to the jus relictæ. Election was of the

The terms in which that should be done are a matter of adjustment with the Board of Trade. As regards the second point, the Court is of opinion that further advertisement should be made.

I may take this opportunity of saying, that in preparing petitions far less attention than is appropriate is paid to the question to whom intimation should be made. It is impossible for the Judge who has charge of the Single Bills to detect or realise the necessity for further advertisement, yet sometimes the inept form, "or such intimation as your Lordships may think proper," is adopted. The only protection is that we have a remit to an accomplished man of business who detects the deficiency in the advertisement, with the consequence of involving parties in greater expense than would have been necessary if the appropriate intimation had been made at first.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Appoint intimation of article 3 of the original memorandum of association, and of the new article of the memorandum proposed to be substituted therefor, to be made by advertisement once in each of the Scotsman and Aberdeen Daily Free Press newspapers, and appoint all parties having interest to lodge answers, if so advised, by the first box-day in vacation."

Poor—Recourse against other parishes—Admission of Liability—Proof of residential settlement.—In 1892 Barony Parish gave parochial relief for seven days to three illegitimate children of a married woman who had been deserted by her husband in 1879. Barony having claimed repayment from Rutherglen, the husband's birth parish, Rutherglen resisted the claim on the ground that the woman had acquired a settlement in Barony by continuous residence therein for five years from August 1883. The two parishes then entered into a joint investigation, in the course of which a signed statement was taken from the woman setting forth her successive places of residence during the five years in question. All these places of residence were in Barony. Thereafter Barony withdrew its claim.

In 1895 the question again arose as to the liability of Rutherglen or Barony for the maintenance of the children, the question still depending on whether the mother had by 1888 acquired a settlement in Barony. The mother had died, and the only evidence, in addition to her statement above mentioned, was the children's birth certificates, which corroborated the mother's statement.

Held (1) that the mere fact that Barony withdrew its claim in 1892 did not import an admission of liability; but (2) that the evidence as a whole shewed that the mother had acquired a residential settlement in Barony Parish.

Parish Council of Rutherglen v. Parish Council of Barony.
2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN January 1896 the Parish Council of the City Parish of Glasgow raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Parish Council of the Parish of Rutherglen, or alternatively against the Parish Council of the Barony Parish, Glasgow, for payment of £38, 12s. 10d. as the amount, with interest, expended by the pursuers on the maintenance of two pauper children named David and John Cross from 20th March 1894 till the raising of the action.

The paupers were the illegitimate children of a Mrs Rose Ann Rice or Ferrier, by a man named Cross. Mrs Ferrier was deserted by her husband Ferrier in 1879, his settlement being then in Rutherglen, the parish of his birth, and it was admitted that Rutherglen was liable for the support of the children, unless Mrs Ferrier had acquired a residential settlement in Barony after her husband's desertion.

Rutherglen averred that she had acquired such a settlement by continuous residence in Barony for five years from August 1883, and that in any event Barony had in certain prior proceedings respecting the children admitted liability.

Barony denied that they had made any admission of liability, and averred that Mrs Ferrier had not resided in their parish continuously for the five years in question, and that even if she had they were not liable, in respect that she had on several occasions during that period been in receipt of parochial relief for herself and her children.

A proof disclosed the following facts:—

From certificates of births produced, and admitted by the parties, it appeared that Mrs Ferrier and Cross had had in all four children, of whom three were born in Barony Parish during the five years in question, viz.:—Mary Cross, born on 25th July 1884, at 85 George Street, Mile-end, Barony; David Cross, born on 10th January 1888, at 16 William Street, Mile-End, Barony: and John Cross, born on 31st January 1889, at 85 George Street, Mile-End, Barony. The fourth child, Ann Cross, was born on 1st May 1891, at 8 Duncan Street, in the City Parish, and died in August 1891, at 85 William Street, Mile-End, Barony. Cross died in July 1892.

In August 1892 Mrs Ferrier was sentenced to seven days' imprisonment for assault, and during these seven days her children received relief from Barony. Barony made a claim against Rutherglen for repayment of this relief. Rutherglen resisted the claim, alleging that Mrs Ferrier had acquired a residential settlement in Barony. The two parishes then entered into a joint investigation, in the course of which Mrs Ferrier and her niece made the following written statement:—

"23d March 1893.

"Pauper states she went to E. Rose Street, where she applied to City Parish, 13th July 1883, and left about one month after.

After she died I went to 85 George Street, where John was born 31/1/89. I then went to Coalhill St., then Duncan Street (lodging for 4 or 5 months with Mrs Dorrans), then to 18 William Street, M.-E., then E. Hill Street, then E. John Street, where I was living when my children were sent to Poorhouse.

The witness Brand was assistant inspector of Barony, and the witness Edmiston was inspector of Rutherglen.

In May 1893 Barony withdrew their claim against Rutherglen, but gave Rutherglen no written admission of liability.

On this point the books of Barony Parish bore, under date 11th May 1893,—"Claim withdrawn against Rutherglen; settlement alleged to be Barony by residence."

Edmiston, inspector of Rutherglen, deponed,—"I have no written admission by or on behalf of Barony Parish of a residential settlement of the woman in their parish. . . . This final settlement was purely verbal."

Motion, inspector of Barony, deponed,—"It is not the case . . . that I agreed on behalf of Barony Parish to admit certain settlement of residence in that parish; I did nothing of the kind. I am not aware of any verbal arrangement or agreement come to between us personally that I was to admit settlement, nor is it the case that what we then ascertained was to be final for all time and binding on our parish. We came to no such arrangement, and there was no such arrangement that I am aware of."

The evidence regarding the alleged receipt of parochial relief by Mrs Ferrier during the period in which she was said to be acquiring a residence in Barony was to the following effect:—Mrs Ferrier had a legitimate daughter named Lilias Ferrier, who was born on 21st March 1876, and died on 30th April 1888 at 16 William Street, Mile-End, Barony. At various dates between 21st February 1888 and 24th April 1888 Mrs Ferrier received small sums from Barony for medicines for this daughter, and she also received from Barony between the same dates other small sums for the same purpose for herself. The total amount of the former sums was 10s. 9d. and of the latter 6s. 8d.

With reference to these payments Edmiston, the inspector of Rutherglen, deponed,—"I think it was ascertained and established that she had deceived the Barony Parish; she said distinctly that she deceived the inspector of the Barony Parish so that she might receive the attendance of Dr Murdoch, who had a great name for the treatment of consumption. It was also improper relief, because the woman was living in adultery with a man named Cross, who was working as a carter, and she was making cushions, and was not a proper object of relief."

The books of Barony Parish Council, of date 22d April 1893, bore, with reference to the same matter,—"Pauper states she deceived the inspector as to her income, &c. States she had three girls hawking cushions which she had made. It was the neighbours who had told her to apply to the parish to get Dr Murdoch, as they thought he would be better able to pick up her daughter's trouble."

These payments were under the consideration of the two parishes in 1892-3, when the question of Mrs Ferrier's settlement was first raised. Barony gave no notice to Rutherglen of these payments at the time they were made.

Mrs Ferrier died on 23d November 1893 in Stirling Poorhouse.

On 28th May 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds no proof was led to establish that a residential settlement had been acquired by the said Rose Ann Rice or Ferrier in Barony: Finds it not proved that liability was admitted by Barony Parish quoad said children at any time, so as to bar them in this action from disputing liability: Finds therefore the defenders, the Parish Council of the parish of Rutherglen, are liable for the sum sued for, being the fair and reasonable amount for the aliment of said children from the 20th March 1894 until the raising of the present action, with interest thereon from the dates of expenditure: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns against the defenders, the said Parish Council of the parish of Rutherglen," &c.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the question is whether the parish of Rutherglen or the parish of Barony in Glasgow is chargeable for sums given in relief by the City Parish of Glasgow to certain paupers. The questions are (1) whether the Barony Parish made a final admission of liability, and (2) if not, whether the paupers' mother acquired a residential settlement in Barony; and (3) if there was residence for the necessary period, whether the time of residence was interrupted by relief having been applied for and given to her during the period.

As regards the first question, it is not in my opinion made out that there was admission by Barony of liability.

As regards the second the evidence is somewhat peculiar. The mother is now dead, but there is in evidence a statement signed by her, which, if true, shews that she did acquire a settlement in Barony between the years 1883 and 1889. If that statement had been taken from her by the inspector of Rutherglen only, I should not have attached weight to it. Although signed, it would have been in fact nothing but a precognition, which is never admitted as proof, being taken by an interested party, and therefore not necessarily conveying a true deposition of the person examined. But the document is not in that position. It was taken and is authenticated by the signatures of both the representative of Barony and the representative of Rutherglen at the time. It is therefore certified at the time as truly expressing what the deceased had to state in evidence had there been opportunity for examining her. I hold therefore that it is evidence, just as the recollection of what she stated to any person on the matter, not being precognition, would have been admissible. But I think it further to be more weighty than such recollection would have been. It is in truth her written statement of facts, deliberately made and accepted as deliberately made by both the parties. The next question is—Is it corroborated? I think it is substantially corroborated by the birth and death certificates of her children, which are produced, which fix her residence at various times in the places set forth in the statement. There is no contrary evidence, and I hold it sufficiently established that there was residence for the necessary period in Barony.

But it is said, and that is the third point, that residence was interrupted by parochial relief given in the spring of 1888. If this was the fact, it is strange that Barony should have withdrawn from its claim against Rutherglen. But I am satisfied that there was no true interruption, because although certain medical relief was given, the deceased was not truly a person entitled to parochial relief at the time, and got the medical treatment by deceiving the parochial authorities, and she was working and earning money at the time, and living in family with a man who kept her. All this was before Barony Parish at the time, and they on 11th June 1893 noted "claim withdrawn against Rutherglen." This, though it is not held final, may well account for paucity of evidence, as Rutherglen had no reason to suppose that Barony would raise any further question.

I move your Lordships to recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and to decern against the Inspector of Barony.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the appellants have failed to shew that any admission was ever made by the Barony Parish of its liability for the relief of the paupers' mother, at least of such a nature as now to bar that parish from maintaining its present defence. On the other hand, I think the appellants have established that the paupers' mother acquired a residential settlement in Barony, between August 1883 and August 1889. Whether the acquisition of that settlement was barred by reason of parochial relief being afforded by Barony to the paupers' mother in the early part of the year 1888, is a more difficult question. But I have come to be of opinion that at the date when such parochial relief was afforded, the paupers' mother was not a proper object of parochial relief, and that the relief afforded did not therefore bar the acquisition of the settlement. I see no ground for holding that that settlement had been lost when the paupers became chargeable.

LORD MONCREIFF.—Three questions have been argued to us. (1) Did Barony finally admit liability? (2) Assuming that it did not, did the paupers' mother, Mrs Ferrier, reside in the Barony Parish for five years between August 1883 and 31st January 1889? And (3) Was the acquisition of a residential settlement in Barony interrupted by Mrs Ferrier applying for and receiving parochial relief in February, March, and April 1888?

The evidence upon all three questions is narrow. On the first question I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that it would not be safe on the evidence to hold that there was a final admission of liability on the part of Barony. There was a joint investigation which proceeded a considerable length, and at the conclusion of it Barony withdrew its claim against Rutherglen. But there is no sufficient evidence that a deliberate final admission of liability, duly authorised by Barony, was ever made. At the same time, the fact that this joint investigation was made, and that Barony's claim was withdrawn, may have this bearing on the second question, that it may excuse the absence of evidence which would otherwise have been looked for from Rutherglen, to establish the successive residences of the paupers' mother in Barony Parish.

No. 195.

July 11, 1896. Parish Council of Rutherglen v. Parish Council of Barony.

On the second question the evidence is extremely narrow, and I have felt considerable difficulty in assenting to the view that continuous residence for five years in Barony is made out. The Sheriff-substitute says in his note that Rutherglen Parish led no evidence whatever to shew that a residential settlement had been acquired in Barony. It may be true that no parole evidence was led; but there are two important pieces of evidence —first, a signed and witnessed statement by Mrs Ferrier, who is now dead, and her niece, Mrs Fulton, which is printed; and, secondly, the admitted dates and places of births and deaths. The statement by Mrs Ferrier is entitled to weight, because it was taken on the joint examination by the representatives of the two parishes. In that statement she specified various residences in Barony between August 1883 and the end of January 1889. Those residences include houses 85 George Street and 16 William Street. It is important to note that the certificates of the births and deaths of the children corroborate this statement to a considerable extent. Mary was born at 85 George Street on 25th July 1884; David was born at 16 William Street on 10th January 1888; John at 85 George Street on 31st January 1889. Lilias died at 16 William Street on 13th April 1888; and Ann was born at 8 Duncan Street on 1st May 1891 and died at 85 William Street, August 1891. I understand that there is no evidence to the contrary. It is true that there is no further confirmatory evidence, but it is explained that it has been found impossible at this distance of time to obtain it. I therefore, although not without difficulty, agree that there is sufficient proof of continuous residence in Barony between 1883 and 1889.

On the third question—it is proved that in February, March, and April 1888 Mrs Ferrier applied for and got from Barony certain small supplies of medicine, value in all about 18s. If she was a proper object of parochial relief this was quite sufficient to prevent the acquisition of a residential settlement.—Wallace v. Dempster and Deas.[1] But there is, first, the evidence of Edmiston that she was not a proper object of parochial relief, and that she admitted that she had deceived the inspector of Barony, and this is minuted by Barony. Lastly, it is to be observed that if this defence on the part of Barony was well founded, it was sufficient of itself to establish its case against Rutherglen whatever the proof of residence might have been. It is therefore all the more remarkable that Barony should have withdrawn its claim against Rutherglen if it had reason to believe that it was right as to interruption. This, like the other questions in the case, is narrow; but on the whole I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff should be recalled, and that judgment should be given against the Parish Council of the parish of Barony.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutor appealed against: Find in fact that Rose Ann Ferrier had acquired a residential settlement in the Barony Parish of Glasgow, which she had not lost at the time of her death, and which enured to her children, the Succession—Election—Equitable Compensation.—By a universal settlement a testator conveyed his heritable estate to his widow in trust, for behoof of herself in liferent and of his son in fee. He conveyed his whole moveable estate to his widow absolutely. The son having claimed legitim, the widow raised an action against him for declarator that the heritable estate belonged to her in fee-simple. The Court appointed the son to state in a minute whether he averred that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the pursuer's liferent, exceeded the value of his legitim with the interest accrued thereon, and the son having lodged a minute stating that he did not make this averment, the Court held (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling) that the pursuer was entitled to the lands in fee-simple to compensate her pro tanto for the loss which she had sustained in consequence of the defender's election.

1ST DIVISION. LdStormonth-Darling.

SIR CHARLES AUGUSTUS ROSS, of Balnagown, who died in 1883, left a universal settlement, whereby he conveyed to his wife, Lady Ross, in trust, the whole heritable estate held by him in fee-simple, for behoof of herself in liferent allenarly, and for behoof of his son, Charles H. A. F. L. Ross, in fee, in the event of his attaining majority. He further conveyed to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, his whole personal estate, and appointed her his sole executrix.

The testator's son, Sir Charles H. A. F. L. Ross, attained majority on 4th April 1893, and in the following January he brought an action against his mother, Lady Ross, for payment of legitim, with interest, from the date of his father's death.—(Reported supra, p. 802.*)

In June 1894 Lady Ross raised the present action against her son for declarator "that the defender having claimed . . . payment of his legitim, or otherwise, and at all events upon his receiving payment of the sum to be found due to him in name of legitim, must renounce and forfeit all right, title, or interest competent to him in . . . . the whole heritable and real estate" belonging to his father in fee-simple.

The pursuer set forth the son's claim to legitim in the above action. She did not aver that the sum due to the son as legitim exceeded the value of the son's interest under the settlement in the heritable estate liferented by her.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defender having elected to claim his legitim in place of his rights under his father's settlement, has forfeited his right to the unentailed lands thereby conveyed, and the same belong to the pursuer absolutely and in fee-simple. (3) Or otherwise, and at all events upon the pursuer receiving payment of his legitim, the said lands will belong to and be the property of the pursuer absolutely and in fee-simple.

The defender pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

On 19th November 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) appointed the pursuer to state in a minute what she averred "to be the value of the unentailed estate after deducting debts heritably secured thereon, and the actuarial value of her own liferent, and how this sum compares with the admitted amount of the legitim fund."

The pursuer thereafter lodged a minute in which she stated that the net rent of the unentailed estates was £1414, 14s. 2d., and that, on the assumption that they were worth thirty years' purchase of this rental, their capital value would be £42,441 5 0

On 14th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary allowed this minute to be received, and the defender to answer it if so advised.

The defender lodged a minute stating that he was unable to give any admission as to the figures given in the minute for the pursuer, and submitted (1) "that in no event, in the circumstances of the case, can compensation be given until the actual value of what the defender takes under his father's will can be ascertained,—that is, until the pursuer's death: (2) That if the pursuer's contention as to present compensation be sound, the whole calculations should be made as at the date of the late Sir Charles Ross's death: (3) That in any event the pursuer is only entitled to a bond and disposition in security upon the unentailed lands, containing all the usual powers, payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after her own death."

On 4th February 1896 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that the defender has claimed and elected to demand and receive payment of his legitim out of the free moveable estate of his father, the now deceased Sir Charles William Augustus Ross of Balnagown, Baronet; (2) that under and in terms of the trust-disposition and settlement of his said father, dated 17th April 1874, the defender became entitled on the attainment of his majority, which took place on 4th April 1893, to the fee of All and Sundry the whole heritable and real estate of every description, wheresoever situated, belonging to his father at the date of his death, held by him in fee-simple under burden of the liferent of the pursuer, his mother, who under the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement became entitled to the whole moveable estate belonging to the said deceased Sir Charles William Augustus Ross at the date of his death; (3) that the legitim due to the defender, as ascertained and determined in an action at the instance of the defender against the pursuer, the summons in which was signeted on 5th January 1894, amounts to £16,268, 18s. 9d. sterling, with interest thereon from 26th July 1883; (4) that the said sum of £16,268, 18s. 9d., with interest, exceeds the value of the fee of the said unentailed estates provided to the defender in his father's trust-disposition and settlement, after deducting heritable burdens, and the value of the pursuer's liferent: Therefore finds, decerns, and declares that the defender, having claimed and elected to demand and receive payment of his legitim as aforesaid, has renounced in favour of the pursuer all right, title, or interest competent to him under or in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement in regard to the said unentailed estates, and that upon the defender receiving payment of the amount of his legitim, the whole heritable and real estate above mentioned, and described in the summons, will belong to the pursuer as absolute proprietrix thereof in fee-simple, and that she will then be entitled to dispone and convey the same from herself, as trustee acting under the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement, to herself and her own heirs and assignees, free from the trust constituted by the said trust-disposition and settlement: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . It is clear that the defender cannot claim both his legal rights and his conventional provision, and that by claiming legitim he has to that extent frustrated the will and damnified the pursuer. What he must surrender is the fee of the unentailed lands, burdened by the pursuer's liferent, and it is of no consequence that that happens to be a heritable subject, because his right to it is derived through the will, and it is the only right which the will gives him. It is equally clear that he must surrender it in favour of the pursuer, because she, being universal legatory, is the only person who loses by his election.

"The defence stated was founded on the case of Macfarlane's Trustees v. Oliver, 9 R. 1138, which settled that after the amount carved out of an estate by a claim of legitim had been completely restored to it by the application of periodical payments, there was no equitable ground for the principle of absolute forfeiture, and the claimant of legitim was entitled to the future income provided to her by the will. In such a case it is quite accurate to say that the principle is equitable compensation and not forfeiture, and the defender argued that the pursuer's case was irrelevant, because it proceeded on the basis of forfeiture. In view of this distinction, I thought it material to inquire how the comparison stood between the amount of the legitim and the value of the unentailed lands, under deduction of heritable burdens, and the actuarial value of the pursuer's liferent, because, if the present value of the defender's fee had exceeded the legitim, it would have been impossible to give decree in the absolute terms concluded for. The pursuer, in answer to my call, lodged a minute, from which it appears that the free rental of the lands is £1414, 14s. 2d., and that, taking the high figure of thirty years' purchase of that rental and making the deductions which I have mentioned, the result is a net capital value of £16,254, 18s. 1d., as against an ascertained legitim of £16,268, 18s. 9d., to which must be added a very large sum of interest. If these figures are even approximately accurate, it is clear that the remedy which the pursuer asks will still leave her a considerable loser by the defender's claim, and therefore that the distinction between forfeiture and equitable

Ross v. Ross.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—When one party was injured by the election of another party, his right was to be compensated out of the provision rejected by that other party. Compensation, not forfeiture, was the principle to be applied.[1] In this case the summons was framed on the theory that the principle of forfeiture was to be applied, and the pursuer could not obtain decree under a summons in that form. All that she could demand was that the unentailed lands should be sold, and that she should receive compensation out of the proceeds, but the summons contained no conclusions to that effect. If this objection to the form of the summons were got over, the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must still be recalled. He had proceeded on an ex parte statement as to the value of the unentailed lands, which was not admitted, and the proper course was to order the lands to be sold as the only certain mode of ascertaining their value.

Argued for the pursuer;—The term "forfeited" in the summons was perhaps not strictly correct, but its use was not fatal to the summons. Throughout the cases upon equitable compensation, as was pointed out in Macfarlane's Trustees,[1] "forfeiture" was often used in place of "compensation." The reason of this was that the rejected provision being generally less in value than the right claimed, compensation usually resulted in forfeiture. The defender had no right compensation (a very real one in many cases) has no practical importance here. The situation is somewhat similar to that which occurred in the case of Davidson's Trustees, 9 Macph. 995, where the liferents of certain heritable subjects destined directly to the children claiming legitim were directed to be made over to the residuary legatees as forfeited interest; and I observe that Lord Cowan said, 'The distinction between the legal effect of approbate and reprobate and that of equitable compensation might have come into prominence, had the subjects given specifically been alleged to be of greater value than the loss suffered by the general estate through the assertion of the claims for legitim. But no case of that kind is raised under this record.'

"Now, I think I am entitled to proceed upon the figures stated by the pursuer, because the defender does not really challenge them. In his minute, he evades the question of figures altogether, and falls back on the untenable proposition that the value of his right of fee cannot be ascertained till the expiry of the liferent, or in other words, that no compensation can be given to the pursuer until she is dead. Alternatively, he makes the equally untenable suggestion that the whole calculations should be made as at the date of his father's death, instead of the date when the claim of legitim was judicially made; and he propounds a scheme whereby the pursuer is to be satisfied with a bond over the unentailed lands, payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after her own death.

"This last proposal can hardly, I think, be taken seriously, because if anything is certain in this branch of the law, it is, that as the loss caused by a claim of legitim or jus relictæ is immediate, so the compensation must be as immediate as the nature of the surrender interest will allow.

"The defender has a present fee in these lands, none the less that it is burdened with a liferent, and there is no reason why that should not be at once made over to the person who suffers present loss by his claim.

"If the defender's conventional provision had been of the nature of an annual payment, there might have been a chance of the same thing happening as in Oliver's case. But that not being so, I do not see how any rise in the value of land or any other change of circumstances can possibly affect the question. It seems to me therefore, that the pursuer is entitled to decree without further inquiry."

to force a sale of the lands, and would have had none even if the pursuer had not been entitled to a liferent of the lands. He had failed to aver that they were of greater value than the sum due to him as legitim with interest, and the pursuer was entitled to have the lands in fee-simple to compensate her pro tanto for the loss she had sustained through the pursuer's election.

After hearing the parties, the Court appointed the defender to state in a minute "whether he avers that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the pursuer's liferent, exceeds the value of the legitim and interest paid to him, and that within eight days."

In the minute lodged by him, the defender stated "that taking Lady Ross's liferent as being of the value stated by the pursuer, viz., £12,509, 17s. 3d., with regard to which he could give no admission, the defender did not aver that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the said liferent, exceeded the value of the legitim and interest found due to him."

LORD M'LAREN.—After hearing counsel on the reclaiming note we appointed the defender to state in a minute whether he averred that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the pursuer's liferent, exceeded the value of the legitim and interest. A minute has now been lodged for the defender, to the effect that he does not aver that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the said liferent, exceeds the value of the legitim and interest found due to him.

The case now stands in this position: The defender has claimed his legitim, and as a consequence of this claim he is disentitled to assert any claim under his father's will which would diminish the value of the interests of other beneficiaries under that will. Under the will of the late Sir Charles Ross the unentailed lands are given to his widow, Lady Ross, for life, and to the defender Sir Charles Ross in fee. Lady Ross, under the will, takes the personal estate absolutely. By his election to take legitim the defender has diminished the value of Lady Ross's interest in the personalty, and according to the established principle of equitable compensation Lady Ross is entitled to be compensated out of the heritable estate (which the defender is not in a position to claim) for the pecuniary loss which she has sustained by and through the withdrawal of the legitim fund. The only question between the parties relates to the form in which the compensation ought to be made. The claim of the pursuer is that the heritable estate should be declared to be her absolute property; in other words, that her liferent shall be enlarged to a right of fee.

This claim is opposed by the defender, who, as I understood, without committing himself unreservedly to an alternative proposal, suggested that the unentailed estate should be sold, and that compensation might be given out of the proceeds of sale. Now, unless there is any rule of law or equity which prescribes that compensation to a disappointed legatee can only be given in money, the proposed sale of the estate does not commend itself to my mind as a just or expedient measure. If there were any reason to suppose that the defender had made a mistake in his choice, and that the reversion of the estate was really more valuable than the legitim, we might have allowed him to reconsider his election, because a judicial election would not, in general, become final until it had been followed by a decree transferring the fund to the party electing.

It was in view of the possibility of mistake that we gave the defender an opportunity of stating in a minute whether he now says that the right chosen is the less valuable of the two. He does not say so, and I therefore assume that the reversion of the heritable estate is of less value than the legitim fund, and that the compensation to the pursuer is incomplete. That being so, I fail to see why the pursuer should be subjected to the risk of further loss by being compelled to submit to a forced sale of the estate. The defender can take no benefit by the proposed sale, because according to the existing conditions the whole price must be applied for the pursuer's benefit—first, in giving her an equivalent for her life interest in the lands; and secondly, in compensating her for the withdrawal of the legitim fund.

But in putting the argument thus I have understated the pursuer's case. She is a liferenter by disposition, and cannot be compelled to renounce her liferent of the specific estate, or to accept its value in money. Consequently, the hypothetical sale must be a sale of the reversion of the estate only. This, of course, would be a very disadvantageous mode of realisation, and it is not certain that a purchaser could be found at all who would be willing to buy an estate burdened with a liferent.

The only alternative is that which the Lord Ordinary has approved, that Lady Ross, as her husband's trustee, should be empowered to convey the estate to herself beneficially, and I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to compensation in forma specifica, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. Sir Charles Ross's will embraces and disposes of the legitim fund, and therefore it is an implied condition of the bequest which he makes in favour of his son that his son shall not take legitim, but that the whole legitim fund shall go to his widow in consideration of his giving to the son the fee-simple land which he was entitled to dispose of by will. And therefore, if the son refuses to comply with the conditions of the settlement and demands legitim, there can be no question at all that the widow is to be compensated by taking the same amount out of the estate given to the son, since she cannot have the legitim fund which her husband intended for her. But the action is brought for the purpose of obtaining that compensation, and it appears to me that there is no relevant defence stated upon the record.

The only ground for the defence which was maintained in argument was that the Court was not entitled to declare the forfeiture of the heritable estate, because the result of the son's claim to legitim is, according to the argument, not forfeiture of any right given to him by the will, but a right to equitable compensation to those whose interests have been disappointed by his claim. That appeared to me to be a somewhat technical construction of the words used in the summons, because the true meaning of the summons is simply to give effect to what is admittedly the right of the widow, to have handed over to her the estates given by the settlement to the son in order to make up to her for the loss she has sustained through the claim to legitim. It is perfectly true that that right is inaccurately described when it is called a forfeiture, but the error in the use of language arises very commonly, as the Lord President explained in the case of Macfarlane,[1] from the condition of matters in which the claimant is placed by the demand for legitim, because, as his Lordship points out, in the great majority of cases the whole provisions of the refractory legatee are required to restore the administration of the estate against the disturbance caused by the claim for legitim, since the legatee will not in general claim legitim unless he supposes it to be more valuable than the testamentary provision. The result, accordingly, in the great majority of cases, is exactly the same as if the refractory legatee had forfeited his right, and hence the inaccurate use of the term "forfeiture."

But it appears to me that there is nothing in the use of that term to have precluded the defender in this action, if he had thought fit, from bringing forward in defence the plea which upon the theory of his argument would have arisen to him, and from saying, "I am not bound to give up the whole of the fee-simple estates, because they are more valuable than the legitim fund." But if he is not to consent to make over the provision in his favour to the widow by way of compensation, then it lies upon him to shew that he is not bound to do so because that would amount to more than the compensation due. That appears to me to be the only relevant defence he could state to this action, and he refrained from stating it.

I think the Lord Ordinary went somewhat further in his favour than he was entitled to expect when he called upon the widow to state the value of the fee-simple estates. The son is quite entitled to be fully informed as to the relative value of the legitim fund on the one hand, and of his testamentary provisions on the other, before he makes his election, but he was in quite as good a position as the widow could be for ascertaining the value which he himself was prepared to put upon the fee-simple estates. However that may be, he has now had a further opportunity of shewing whether or not the estates given to him under the will are or are not more valuable than the legitim fund; and he declines to say that they are more valuable. Therefore I am unable to see that he has any relevant defence to the widow's claim.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Discharge—Reparation—Master and Servant.—In defence to an action of damages for personal injuries sustained by the pursuer when in the employment of the defenders, the defenders pleaded that the action was excluded by a receipt signed by the pursuer, and bearing that he had received from the defenders the sum of £10 as compensation for his injuries, "and this sum I accept in full discharge of all claims I can or may make in respect of said injury, either under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or otherwise." With reference to this discharge the pursuer averred that the defenders' manager "called upon the pursuer within a week of his leaving the infirmary, and induced him, when he was in a weak state of body and mind, and without advice, to sign the receipt."

The Court dismissed the action, holding that no relevant grounds had been stated for setting aside the discharge.

Woods v. North British Railway Company, 18 R. (H. L.) 27, followed.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire.

IN October 1895 John Mackie, calender worker, Dundee, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Dundee against Strachan, Kinmond, & Company, calenderers, Dundee, for £200 as damages for the loss of his left arm which had been amputated in consequence of injuries received by the pursuer on 24th March 1894, when in the defenders' employment.

The defenders, besides pleading that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, maintained that the action was excluded by the following receipt granted by the pursuer on 5th May 1894:—"Received from Messrs Strachan, Kinmond, & Company, East Port Calender, Dundee, the sum of £10 sterling, as compensation for personal injury received by me on 24th March 1894 while in their employment, and this sum I accept in full discharge of all claims I can or may make in respect of said injury, either under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or otherwise." Then followed the pursuer's signature across a penny stamp.

The pursuer stated that he was sixty-eight years of age, and further (Cond. 5)—"Explained and averred that defenders' manager, Mr Forbes, called upon the pursuer within a week of his leaving the infirmary, and induced him, when he was in a weak state of body and mind, and without advice, to sign said receipt for £10, on the distinct assurance that he would not be left in want. The defenders have not implemented the conditions on which the said receipt was granted to them."

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith), and on appeal the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), having dismissed the action on the ground of irrelevancy, the pursuer appealed, and on the question raised by the receipt argued;—The pursuer's averments in regard to the granting of the receipt would have entitled him to bring a reduction, but under the Sheriff Court Act, 1877, a reduction was not necessary. The case of Woods[1] was distinguishable. In that case there had been a proof; here the defenders maintained that the action should be dismissed without inquiry. The pursuer was willing to repay £10 if allowed to proceed with this action.

The defenders were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There may of course be some cases in which the pursuer, although he has granted such a discharge as we have here, may make such averments on record as would lead to inquiry being made into the circumstances in which it was granted. But in the present case I find on record no averment to the effect that the pursuer was not quite as fit both in body and mind to grant a discharge as the pursuer in the case of Woods[1] was held to be. With reference to that case I may remark that we gave our decision after the defenders' counsel had stated to us that he could not maintain the discharge to the effect of excluding the action, but in the House of Lords the learned Lords were asked to hold the discharge as excluding the action.

No. 197. LORD YOUNG concurred.

July 15, 1896. Mackie v. Strachan, Kinmond, & Co.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree that this discharge is a complete bar to the present action. No doubt the discharge might have been set aside if relevant averments for the purpose had been made and proved. I think reduction would not have been indispensable, and that if averments sufficient to warrant setting aside the discharge had been made and proved, it might have been set aside by exception under the Sheriff Court Act, 1877. But we have here no grounds to support reduction or exception. The discharge is complete and adequate, and there is nothing to shew that it was not an honest settlement fully understood by the pursuer.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I concur. I find in the statements of the pursuer no grounds which would support an action of reduction of this discharge.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Low.

IN 1895 the trustees of the Free Church of Scotland called up a bond and disposition in security for £24,000, which they held over the estate of Kinnaird, and in virtue of the powers contained in the bond, sold the estate.

The price realised was £28,650. After applying this sum in liquidation of the bond and interest and in making the other payments incident to the sale and conveyance of the subjects, the trustees, on 11th November 1895, consigned the surplus, amounting to £2528, 13s. 8d., in the joint names of the sellers and purchaser, in the National Bank of Scotland.*

On 27th February 1896 Hugh Lindsay Antrobus and another, who held a postponed bond and disposition in security for £12,000 over the estate of Kinnaird, presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary for a warrant to uplift the consigned sum of £2528, 13s. 8d.

They stated that both the sellers and purchaser declined to endorse the deposit-receipt.

The Accountant of Court thereupon presented a note, in which, after reciting sections 2 and 3 of the Court of Session Consignations

* The Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101), sec. 122, enacts,—"The creditor upon receipt of the price shall be bound to hold count and reckoning therefor with the debtor and postponed creditors . . . and to consign the surplus which may remain after deducting the debt secured" and expenses in bank, "in the joint names of the seller and purchaser for behoof of the parties having best right thereto."

Section 3,—"The provisions of section 35 of the Judicial Factors Act, 1849, and of sections 5 and 6 of the Bill-Chamber Procedure Act, 1857, so far as relating to consignations, are hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby provided that the Accountant shall be the sole custodier of all consignations under this Act, and the Clerk of Court, in each process in which, after the passing of this Act, a consignation is made, shall forthwith lodge the same with the Accountant, whose receipt therefor shall be a discharge to such Clerk.

"No fees shall be payable to the Accountant in cases of consignations other than those which are or may be prescribed by the Lords of Council and Session with the sanction of the Treasury."

Section 5,—"Within ten days after the receipt of any consignation in money, the Accountant shall lodge the same or deposit-receipt in one of the banks in Scotland established by Act of Parliament or Royal Charter, and every deposit-receipt for money lodged in any of the said banks representing a consignation, whether lodged by the Accountant or by any party to a cause, or by any other person, shall be taken in name of the Accountant and his successors in office, and shall bear on the face of it the name of the party or parties by whom or on whose behalf the consignation is made, and of the cause or proceeding or bond to which it relates."

† "NOTE.—The question which is raised by the note which the Accountant of Court has lodged in this petition is whether the provisions of the Court of Session Consignations (Scotland) Act, 1895, are applicable to the surplus of the price of heritable subjects sold by the creditor in a bond and disposition in security, and consigned in bank in terms of the 122d section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868. . . .

"It was on the one hand contended for the Accountant of Court (1) that the consigned money fell within the definition of a consignation in the Act of 1895, being money consigned in virtue of the provisions of an Act of Parliament; and (2) that the provision of the 5th section of the Act of 1895, that every deposit-receipt for a consignation should be taken in the name of the Accountant, whether lodged by him 'or by any other person,' was wide enough to cover the case of money consigned under the 122d section of the Titles to Land Act.

"On the other hand, the petitioners contended that if the Act of 1895 had been intended to apply to the case of the surplus price of property sold by a bondholder, the 122d section of the Titles to Land Act would have been repealed. They further founded upon the last clause of the 5th section, which provides that the deposit-receipt shall bear on its face the names of the parties 'by whom or on whose behalf the consignation is made, and of the cause or proceeding or bond to which it relates.' The latter

The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Court and of the Lord Ordinary.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The lands of Kinnaird were sold by the holders of a first bond and disposition in security; and the bondholders, after satisfying their own debt, consigned the surplus, in terms of the 122d section of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, in the joint names of the seller and purchaser, for behoof of the party or parties having best right thereto. The petitioners are second bondholders for a sum much exceeding the consigned money, and they ask warrant to uplift it. Their right to have this is indisputable, unless it is affected by the question raised by the Accountant of Court.

That question is this:—The consignation was made in November 1895, and in the June previous the Court of Session Consignations (Scotland) Act had passed and came into operation. The Accountant says that this consignation ought to have been made in his name, in virtue of the Consignations Act, and not in the names of the seller and purchaser, as prescribed by the Act of 1868.

The question thus raised is whether the provision in the Act of 1868 is repealed by the Act of 1895.

It was not made clear to us what effect, if any, an affirmative answer would have on the right of the petitioners to have up this money; and I have not realised any valid reason for refusing the prayer whichever answer is given. But this, of itself, suggests some doubt of the soundness of the Accountant's theory of the legislation under consideration.

Proceeding, however, to consider the question raised by the Accountant, it is well to put ourselves in the position of the first bondholders, and to ask which was their true statutory guide when considering in whose name to consign. The matter in hand, be it observed, is in its nature highly technical, affecting heritable title, and forming part of a conveyancing system embodied in statute. For this exact and particular case, section 122 contains a precise and peremptory direction,—the consignation is to be made in the names of the seller and purchaser. Let it be noted also that the words are a repetition of the words of the second section, which refer to money received by the Accountant or a Clerk of Court for deposit or consignation 'in any cause or proceeding,' and 'to any sum received by way of caution or security in corroboration of any bond.' In the case of the surplus price of lands sold by a bondholder, the receipt could not be in the form required by the 5th section, because in such a case there is no cause or proceeding in which money is consigned with the Accountant or a Clerk of Court, and the money is not consigned by way of caution or security in corroboration of any bond.

"The question appears to me to be not without difficulty, and as it is of importance that the scope of the Consignations Act should be authoritatively defined, I have thought it right to report the case.

"As there is some hardship in keeping the petitioners out of their money until the summer session, I have granted warrant to them to uplift the consigned fund, with the exception of the sum of £100, which will remain in bank until the question of the application of the Consignations Act is determined."

selling bondholder does not require to go near a Court of law, the Legislature directs him as to the due mode of exercising his rights for himself. The enactment of 1868, therefore, is in a totally different chapter of law from that which regulates the disposition of moneys in the hands of law Courts or of suitors in law Courts.

Now, the Court of Session Consignations Act, whatever other regions it may be proved to touch or invade, is, at all events prima facie, an Act about judicial arrangements. I do not speak merely of the title, as prescribed by section 1, but of the Act read as a whole.

But, then, the Accountant has drawn our attention to the effect of the 2d section on the 3d section, and to the relative provision of the 5th section; and we must give heed to the definition of "consignation" in the 2d section as "any sum of money consigned under any Act of Parliament," and to the very general words of section 5, which speak of the consignations falling under the Act as being in some instances made by "any other person" than the Accountant or any party to a cause.

Now, for myself, I am bound to say that, if those words are to be taken in their primary sense, they would cover the present case, which is that of a consignation made under an Act of Parliament. But then it may be that the other parts of the Act, and the scheme of the Act generally, shew that these words are not used in their full latitude, but are limited by the practical provisions of the Act.

Now, if the operative provisions of the Act are examined, it will be found that there are effective provisions about consignations made in the course of all sorts of judicial proceedings, but there are no effective provisions which can be applied to such a consignation as we are now considering, which is made in relation to no judicial proceeding. Adhering, as I desire to do, to the question directly before us, I cannot discover any indication that the Legislature intended, incidentally to a Court of Session Act, to revise the conveyancing code in a matter not relating to the Court of Session. It is, I think, certain that, in a matter of this kind, there would have been a businesslike revision and adjustment of the existing statutory regulations and express provisions, or an express repeal of conflicting provisions. The absence of any such evidence of intention is strong support to the limited view of the Act suggested by its title, and this view is further confirmed by the complete absence of any machinery for compelling conformity with the provisions of the Act if it had the wider sense.

The leading enactment in the statute is in the 3d section. The pith and gist of the Act is that the Accountant "shall be the sole custodier" of consignations falling under the Act. Now, whereas the Act, by practical steps, puts judicial consignations into his custody, by the enforced action of officials, there are no similar steps taken for his even so much as obtaining custody of consignations like the present.

Here, for instance, are lands being sold all over Scotland, some small and some large, and consignations being made in all the branches of all the banks. If the Legislature had intended to alter the conveyancing code in order to obtain the custody desired, it would of course have set up some machinery for obtaining for the Accountant from the banks or from the consigners immediate intimation of consignations. As things stand, it must be by pure accident if the Accountant ever hears of such consignation, for it is not his duty to organise a system of inquisition, nor is it the duty of anyone else to inform him of particular cases.

Such considerations lead me to the conclusion that the general words of the Act of 1895 must be checked by its effective provisions, and, in particular, that it was not intended to repeal or alter the 122d section of the Act of 1868. The Acts of Parliament mentioned in the general words of the Court of Session Consignations Act are probably the Acts which require consignation in judicial proceedings. But those words do not necessitate or warrant the conclusion that they apply to Acts of Parliament dealing with matters outside the system which is effectively dealt with by the Act. The effective and operative enactments of a statute evidence and determine its scope. It is not to be lightly concluded that the Legislature would make an excursion from what is prima facie its scope, to unsettle conveyancing practice, and, while not expressly repealing a statutory rule of that practice (against which no one has ever heard any complaint) to prescribe a proceeding which would not result in the achievement in the case of such consignations of that "custody" which is the object of the Act. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the 122d section of the Act of 1868 was rightly followed in the case before us.

LORD ADAM.—This case has been reported by the Lord Ordinary in order that an authoritative decision of the Court may be obtained as to the scope of the Court of Session Consignations (Scotland) Act, 1895, and in particular, whether its provisions are applicable to the surplus of heritable subjects, sold by the creditor in a bond and disposition in security, and consigned in bank in terms of the 122d section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868.

That section expressly directs that such surplus shall be consigned in bank "in the joint names of the seller and purchaser, for behoof of the parties having best right thereto." That was done in this case, and the deposit-receipt taken in the terms prescribed by the Act.

The Accountant of Court, however, maintains that this consignation was erroneous, and that the money should have been deposited in his name, and the deposit-receipt transmitted to him.

As I understand, he founds this contention on the 2d section of the Court of Session Consignations Act, which enacts that, in that Act, the expression "consignation" shall extend and apply to any sum of money consigned or deposited in any bank under orders of the Court, "or in virtue of the provisions of any Act of Parliament," and on the 5th section, which enacts, that "every deposit-receipt for money lodged in any of the said banks,"—that is, "banks in Scotland established by Act of Parliament or royal charter"—"representing a consignation, whether lodged by the Accountant, or by any party to a cause, or by any other person, shall be taken in name of the Accountant and his successors in office"; and he argues that this money is consigned in bank in virtue of the provisions of an Act of Parliament, that it is therefore a consignation to which the Act applies, and that therefore the deposit-receipt should have been taken in name of the Accountant. If this construction of the Consignation Act be correct, there can be no doubt that its scope is very wide indeed. It would not only repeal the express provision as to the mode of consignation in the case in question, but similar provisions in many other Acts which contain express directions as to the mode and manner in which money should be consigned. I should demur to the proposition that such express provisions contained in other Acts are to be held as repealed by the mere general words used in this Act. But I do not think that the Act was intended to have, or has, any such wide-reaching effect. I think it deals only with consignations of money in the Court of Session, and the short title of the Act, which is "the Court of Session Consignations (Scotland) Act, 1895," certainly suggests that. Then, again, the wide definition of the word "consignation" which is to be found in the 2d section is merely a definition of the word as used in that Act, and has no effect, except in so far as it is brought into operation by the subsequent clauses of the Act.

The 3d section obviously refers solely to the Court of Session and its officers, the Accountant and Clerks of Court.

The 4th section refers solely to the Court of Session and to the duties of the Accountant.

The 5th section provides that the Accountant, within ten days after the receipt of any consignation in money, shall lodge the same in one of the banks of Scotland established by Act of Parliament or royal charter,—so far the clause relates only to the Court of Session and its officers. Then it goes on to provide for the terms in which deposit-receipts are to be taken, and enacts that every deposit-receipt for money lodged in any of the said banks—that is, banks established by Act of Parliament or royal charter—representing a consignation, whether lodged by the Accountant, or by any party to a cause, or any other person, shall be taken in the name of the Accountant and his successors in office. The Accountant says "any other person" here means any other person whatever, whether a party to a cause or concerned with a cause or not. I do not think so, because the clause goes on to provide that the deposit-receipt shall bear on the face of it the name of the party or parties on whose behalf the consignation is made, and of the cause or proceeding or bond to which it relates. Therefore, the deposit-receipt referred to is a deposit-receipt relating to some cause or proceeding, which is to be set forth on the face of it. I do not think that the clause has any wider application than to causes and proceedings. It will be observed that it applies only to deposit-receipts for money consigned in banks established by Acts of Parliament or by royal charter, presumably because it is only in such banks that the Court orders consignation. But there is no such limit to consignations under the Titles to Land Act, and accordingly the money in this case was consigned in the National Bank, which is not one of these banks, and the 5th section, on which the Accountant relies, does not in terms apply to it.

I think the Accountant must make out that the effect of the Consignations Act is not merely to alter the parties in whose names the deposit-receipt is to be taken, but also to limit the banks in which consignation may be made. I do not see how otherwise he can bring the case under the 5th section, and I see no warrant for that.

The 6th section provides that the Accountant shall be responsible for the safe custody of the consignations made with him, and shall be bound to account for the same to the person having right thereto, subject to the orders of Court. It therefore relates solely to the Court and its officers.

These are the only clauses of the Act which were referred to as bearing on the construction of the Act for which the Accountant contends. In my view there is nothing in any of these clauses directing in whose names or in what terms deposit-receipts shall be taken except in the 5th, and that relates only to deposit-receipts for money consigned in causes or proceedings in Court, and therefore I think that the Act has no application to parties in the petitioners' position.

I may be permitted to add a few words as to the results which would follow if effect were given to the construction of the Act contended for by the Accountant. Take, for example, consignations under the Titles to Land Act under which the present question arises. I suppose these consignations are more or less numerous all over Scotland. I have never heard of any inconvenience arising from the present practice, and I can conceive no reason why the deposit-receipts should be taken in the name of the Accountant of Court, and all sent up to Edinburgh, with the result that the money could only be uplifted by incurring the expense of an application to the Court. In most cases, as I understand, the money at present is uplifted by the seller and purchaser simply indorsing the deposit-receipt. Why that facility was not given effect to in this case I do not know.

Another example may be taken from the Bankruptcy Statute of 1856, the 129th section of which provides that all disputed dividends shall be deposited in bank in names of the trustee and commissioners until the appeals are disposed of. It does not occur to me that it would be desirable that these deposits should be deposited with the Accountant, only to be got up again by an application to the Court.

Or take the Sheriff Court Consignations Act, which was passed only two years ago, and which contains provisions applicable to the Sheriff Court very similar to those in the Court of Session Consignations Act.

By section 4 of the Sheriff Court Act all consignations of not less than £5 are directed to be deposited in bank, and the deposit-receipts therefor taken in the name of the Sheriff-clerk and his successors in office. I cannot suppose it was intended that this should be repealed, and the deposit-receipts for all these small sums taken in the name of the Accountant of Court and remitted to him; yet that would be the result of the Accountant's contention,—instead of their remaining as at present, subject to the orders of the Sheriff, as no doubt they ought to be.

I have no doubt there are numerous other statutes which would be similarly affected.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the money was properly consigned in this case, and that warrant should be granted to the petitioners to uplift the balance remaining in bank.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur, but I wish to reserve my opinion as to the effect of any Act of Parliament directing any money to be consigned subject to the orders of the Court. As at present advised, I should apprehend that money so consigned would fall under the provisions of the Consignations Act.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I concur, as I understand your Lordships also do, that the judgment now pronounced will not affect money ordered to be consigned subject to the orders of the Court.

The LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in that observation.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition in so far as the balance of £2528, 13s. 8d. remained consigned, and found the Accountant of Court liable in expenses.

Hoy v. Magistrates of Portobello.

BENJAMIN WILLIAM HOY, Petitioner (Appellant).—Clyde.
MAGISTRATES AND TOWN-COUNCIL OF PORTOBELLO, Respondents.—Young.

Police—Buildings—Open space attached to dwelling-house—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 170.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 170, enacts that "every building erected for the purpose of being used as a dwelling-house . . . shall have all the rooms sufficiently lighted and ventilated from an adjoining street or other open space directly attached thereto equal to at least three-fourths of the area to be occupied by the intended building."

The proprietor of ground within a burgh proposed to build thereon two rows of dwelling-houses parallel to each other, both facing public streets and with unbuilt-on ground separating them behind. This back ground was less than one and a-half times the extent of the combined areas to be occupied by the two rows of houses, but was greater than three-fourths of the area to be occupied by each row taken separately.

Held that the whole of the back ground was open space directly attached to each of the rows of houses in the sense of the above section, and consequently that the statutory requirements with respect to ventilation behind the houses would be satisfied.

2D DIVISION. Dean of Guild Court, Portobello.

THIS was a petition to the Dean of Guild Court, Portobello, by Benjamin William Hoy, for warrant to pull down buildings and to erect new buildings.

The petition was opposed by the Magistrates and Town-council of Portobello, on the ground that the proposed new buildings would not comply with the requirements of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, with respect to open spaces for ventilation.*

The following statement of the facts is taken from the note appended to the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild Court:—"The petitioner is proprietor of buildings fronting the promenade on the sea-beach, occupied as a temperance hotel and baths, with vacant ground

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 170, enacts,—"Every building erected for the purpose of being used as a dwelling-house, or any building not previously used as a dwelling-house, when the same is altered for the purpose, shall have the rooms sufficiently lighted and ventilated from an adjoining street or open space directly attached thereto equal to at least three-fourths of the area to be occupied by the intended building; and such space shall be free from any erections thereon other than water-closets, ash-pits, coal-houses, or other conveniences, all which conveniences shall, as to height, position, and dimensions, be erected subject to the consent and approval of the Commissioners. . . ."

at the side and back thereof. He proposes to pull down and remove the buildings so as to have an area of vacant ground on which to erect certain tenements of shops and dwelling-houses. This area is bounded on the north partly by the promenade and partly by a two-storey building belonging to and occupied by John Grant, publican; on the west partly by said building and partly by Bath Street; on the south by Straiton Place; and on the east by a lane running from Straiton Place to the promenade. The petitioner craves warrant to build upon the promenade frontage two tenements of shops and dwelling-houses three storeys in height above the shops, with attics, containing sixteen separate dwellings; and one tenement of dwelling-houses, four storeys in height, with attics, containing ten separate dwellings; and upon the Straiton Place frontage four tenements of dwelling-houses, three storeys in height, with attics, containing thirty-seven separate dwellings. The tenements facing the promenade and those facing Straiton Place will be built on parallel lines, with a vacant piece of ground between them. This ground is not of sufficient size to allow of appropriating to the promenade tenements a space of three-fourths of the area to be occupied by them, and also a like space for the Straiton Place tenements, although it is much more than sufficient for either of them. The full measurement necessary to meet both of these requirements would be 1489 square yards or thereby, while the superficial area of the ground in question is only 1072 square yards or thereby, being a deficiency of 417 square yards. The proposed tenements are shewn on the block plan to be each 45 feet deep from the street fronts, and the space between the back walls measures 53 feet across. The width of Straiton Place is 30 feet, including footpaths."

On 3d July 1896 the Dean of Guild Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the petitioner has not in the preparation of his plans made proper and sufficient provisions for complying with the requirements of section 170 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, to have all the rooms of his intended buildings sufficiently lighted and ventilated from an adjoining street or other open space directly attached thereto, equal to at least three-fourths of the area to be occupied by the intended buildings: Therefore refuse to grant the warrant craved." *

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—The Dean of Guild Court had misconstrued the 170th section of the statute. In the first place, the section on a sound construction meant that there must be an open space of the specified extent both behind and in front of the building. One legitimate reading of the words was, that it was enough that the free space behind and the street in front together amounted to the specified extent. But taking it that the space behind must by itself be equal to at least three-fourths of the area to be occupied by the intended building, that condition would be satisfied here. "Directly attached" meant physically attached, and if the whole free space behind the buildings was of the extent specified in the statute it was immaterial that half of the ground belonged to the proprietors of the tenements on the other side. It was not suggested that only a half of the street should be taken into consideration in calculating the free space in front, and the language of the statute required that the same rule should be applied to the ground behind.

* "NOTE.— . . . It was contended for the petitioner that being proprietor of the ground behind both lines of tenements he was entitled to reckon the whole space as directly attached to each line instead of one-half thereof to each, and that thereby he had made proper provision for complying with the requirement of section 170 of the Police Act. The Court cannot adopt this view, but must find that there should be an open space directly attached to each tenement equal to at least three-fourths of the area thereof. Although the buildings and ground will at first belong to one proprietor, the tenements are being built for the purpose of sale, and may soon be divided among many owners."

Argued for the Magistrates and Town-council;—The policy of the Act was that there should be the specified extent of street facing the windows in front and the specified extent of back free space facing the windows behind. The result of the petitioner's construction was that "adjoining" and "directly attached" meant the same thing, so that the one expression or the other was unnecessary, which was a result to be avoided in the construction of statutes. The sound construction was that "adjoining" qualified "street," and meant connected in situation, which was the only relation that a private property could have to a public street, while "directly attached" meant connected in title—attached as a pertinent of the building. In this view the proposed buildings would not comply with the statute, for there could be no doubt that the area behind would be divided in property between the two rows of tenements.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It appears to me that upon a proper reading of this clause the requirements of the statute have been sufficiently fulfilled by the petitioner, and that the judgment of the Dean of Guild Court is erroneous.

LORD YOUNG.—I am clearly of the same opinion. I think that the argument for the respondents is not stateable. The words of the Act are "lighted and ventilated from an adjoining street or other open space directly attached thereto." I read that as meaning "street directly attached thereto, or other open space directly attached thereto," and "attached thereto," means coming up to or touching, so that an adjoining street which comes up to the building will be an open space directly attached thereto, and in calculating the street open space you are not to measure up to the medium filum of the street merely, you are to measure the whole street, because it is the street as a whole which comes up to or touches the building, and so is attached to it. So with regard to the open space behind the building, you are not to measure merely up to the medium filum, it is the whole open space which is attached to the building just as in the case of the street.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD MONCREIFF concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild Court, and remitted the petition for further procedure.

Mines and Minerals—Lease—Construction.—A proprietor let to a tenant the coal under certain lands described, with the sole right of working and winning "the whole or any part of said coal" for the period of 171 years, but with power to the tenant to renounce the lease in certain events, and, inter alia, so soon as that part of the coal was worked out which lay above what was known as the day level. On his part the tenant bound himself to pay to the landlord, "as long as the workings are confined to that part of the coal which is above" the day level, a fixed rent of £200, or in the option of the landlord one-seventh of the gross produce of the coal. He also bound himself to proportion the working of the splint seam "as nearly as possible" to the other seams in the same manner as was observed in other well-regulated collieries. It was further agreed that in case the tenant, his heirs and successors, "shall not avail themselves of the break stipulated for in this lease when that part of the coal is worked out which lies above" the day level, "but shall declare their intention of proceeding to work out the remainder of the coal, . . . then and in that event, and so soon as the said coal lying above the said level shall be completely worked out . . . the rent and proportion hereinbefore specified . . . shall thencefurth cease and determine," and the tenant and his foresaids "shall in lieu thereof" be bound to pay a fixed rent of £150, or in the option of the landlord one-tenth of the gross produce of the coal, "the said restricted rent to commence either upon the day in which the sale of the coal under the foresaid level commences, or at the expiry of two years from the day upon which the former rent ceases, whichever of these events shall first happen."

In an action raised by the landlord for declarator that the tenant was not entitled to work the coal below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted, the tenant maintained that, as no restriction was expressed in the lease, no restriction was to be implied. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the tenant was not entitled to work coal below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted.

Lease—Mineral Lease—Agreement to alter—Proof—Acquiescence in contravention of lease—Personal Bar.—By the provisions of the lease of a coal-field granted in 1798 for a period of 171 years, the tenant and his successors were not entitled to work the coal below what was known as the "day level" until the coal above that level was exhausted. In 1828 it was found that the most valuable seam in the field was practically worked out above the day level, and the tenant, with the approval of the landlord, began to work below that level. After that date, with occasional intervals, the tenant and his successors continued, with the knowledge and tacit consent of the landlord, to work coal below the day level, although the upper seams of coal were unexhausted, and with the view to such working they drove mines to the lower seams.

In an action raised by the landlord in 1895, for declarator that the tenant was not entitled to work coal below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted, and for interdict, held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the landlord's consent to the tenant's deviation from the lease in the past did not imply an agreement to alter the terms of the lease, and that the landlord had done nothing to bar himself from demanding their observance in the future.

to him or them to "subsett the same in whole or in part," All and Whole the coal within and under certain lands described, "together with the sole exclusive right and privilege of winning, working, selling . . . and leading off the whole or any part of said coal . . . lying and situated within or under the bounds before ascertained and described" for the period of 171 years, but with power to the said Sir John Henderson to renounce the lease in certain events, and, inter alia, tertio, "So soon as that part of the coal is worked out which lies above the said Sir John Henderson's present level,* as it now stands in stone," in Fordel ground; and lastly, when the coal was entirely worked out. On his part Sir John Henderson bound himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to pay to William Wemyss, his heirs, executors, and assignees, "and that as long as the workings are confined to that part of the coal which is above the said Sir John Henderson's present level," the rent of £200 annually, or in the option of William Wemyss and his foresaids, one-seventh part of the gross produce (under a certain deduction) of the coal worked out and sold from "the subjects hereby sett." Moreover, Sir John Henderson bound himself and his foresaids during the subsistence of the lease, to work the coal in no other than a regular and workmanlike manner, and more particularly "to proportion the working of the splint seam as nearly as possible to the other seams, in the same manner as is observed in Fordel or other well-regulated collieries." It was provided that William Wemyss and his foresaids, or any person having written authority from them, might, as often as they thought proper, inspect the workings, and Sir John Henderson bound himself and his foresaids to keep regular books shewing the output and sale, which should be open to the inspection of the landlord. Moreover, it was agreed betwixt the parties "that in case Sir John Henderson and his foresaids shall not avail themselves of the break stipulated for in this lease, when that part of the coal is worked out which lies above the said Sir John Henderson's present level . . . . but shall declare their intention of proceeding to work out and exhaust the remainder of the coal in the premises hereby lett, by means of a deeper cut level or of a steam-engine or other machinery . . . then, and in that event, and so soon as the said coal lying above the said level shall be completely worked out and disposed of, the rent and proportion hereinbefore specified and fixed shall from thenceforth cease and determine, and the said Sir John Henderson and his foresaids shall in lieu thereof be bound and obliged, as he hereby binds and obliges himself and them to pay to the said William Wemyss and his foresaids £150 sterling of fixed rent only, or in the said William Wemyss and his foresaid's option, one-tenth part of the gross produce of the coal" (subject to a certain deduction) as the yearly rent of the subjects let, "the said restricted rent to commence either upon the day in which the sale of the coal . . . under the foresaid level commences, or at the expiry of two years from the day upon which the former rent ceases, whichever of these events shall first happen."

By lease, dated in 1832, Robert Wemyss of Cuttlehill, who was then in right of the lessor under the lease of 1798, let to Dame Anne Isabella Henderson Durham, and Sir Philip Durham, her husband, who were then in right of the lessee under the former lease, and to the said Anne I. Henderson Durham's heirs and assignees, the coal under certain lands lying contiguous to those specified in the lease of 1798, for the period of 137 years, it being provided that the lessees should pay a fixed rent of £150 per annum, or, in the lessor's opinion, one-eighth of the gross produce (subject to a certain deduction) of all coal worked above the day level, and one-tenth of the gross produce (subject to the same deduction) of all coal worked below said level. The lessees bound themselves "within two years from the 24th day of November 1831, to complete a proper and substantial winning to the splint coal, at or near the south-west corner of the field, marked No. 3" on the plans signed as relative to the lease, "which winning shall be made to the north of No. 6 dyke, and the engine-pit of the said winning shall be situated so near to the Dirthill dyke as to work out the whole splint and other coals between these dykes to the depth of the said winning, that is to say, not only the whole coal hereby let, but also the whole coal possessed by the said parties in right of the said Sir John Henderson" under the lease of 1798.* The lessees further bound themselves to bring forward the Fordel day level to the pits of the foresaid winning, and power was given to them to communicate the Fordel day level through the portion of the Cuttlehill coalfield which they already possessed (i.e., under the lease of 1798) to the coalfield "hereby let."

In 1854 the Carron Company acquired the rights of the lessors under the two leases above mentioned, and in 1895 they brought an action against the trustees of the deceased George William Mercer Henderson, who were in right of the lessees under the said leases, in which they concluded, inter alia, (1) for declarator that the defenders, as lessees under the lease of 1798 were not entitled, until that part of the coal thereby let "which lies above the day level, called in the said lease 'Sir John Henderson's level,' and generally known in the district as the 'Fordel day level,' is completely worked out, to work and win any part of the remainder" of said coal, "except only in so far as it lies within the area between the dykes known as the No. 6 dyke and the Dirthill dyke respectively," and for interdict against their doing so.

The pursuers made averments to the following effect:—There was a large quantity of coal above the day level in the leasehold of 1798 still unwrought, and it was the duty of the defenders under the lease of 1798 to confine their workings within that leasehold to such coal until it was completely exhausted. They had, however, discovered the coal below said level to be better in quality and more profitable to work than the bulk of the coal above it, and had therefore proceeded to work it.

The defenders admitted that there was still coal let by the lease of 1798 lying above the day level unwrought. They made statements to the following effect:—Workings below the day level had been opened by them prior to 1829, and since that date they had worked sometimes above, sometimes below, and sometimes both above and below. The lessors knew all along that the splint coal was being worked below the day level, and that outwith the area between No. 6 dyke and the Dirthill dyke. The lease of 1832 proceeded on the footing that the defenders had a right so to work. The pursuers were all along well aware that without such working the obligation contained in the 1798 lease to proportion the working of the splint seam to the other seams could not have been implemented, and acquiesced and agreed with the lessees in simultaneous workings above and below the day level being carried on. On the faith of said agreement the defenders' pits, machinery, and workings had been made and adapted for such simultaneous working at an expense largely in excess of what would have been incurred if no coal was to be worked below the level until the coal above had been exhausted. The abandonment of the pits and workings thus made would occasion a heavy loss to the defenders.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) The pursuers are excluded by mora, taciturnity, and acquiescence from insisting in the present action. (5) In respect of the actings of parties as condescended on, the defenders should be assoilzied. (6) The conclusions of the summons not being warranted by the leases founded on, or either of them, the defenders should be assoilzied.

Proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that the most valuable coal in the fields let was the splint, which was the lowest seam, and that until about 1850 it required a proportion of at least one-half of splint to make the other coals saleable. A proportion of splint was still necessary to meet the requirements of the market. The splint seam in the 1798 leasehold was practically worked out above the day level prior to 1828, and it was shewn that as early as that year the lessees had begun, with the knowledge and approval of the landlord, to work the splint seam below the day level, and had since that date, with occasional intervals, continued, with the same knowledge and approval, to work coal in the 1798 leasehold below the day level, their right to work below the level, so far as appeared, never having been questioned until the case noted below was in the House of Lords. The knowledge and approval of the landlords appeared, inter alia, from a series of reports by the mining engineers employed by them to inspect the workings on their behalf, from letters written by the landlords in 1846 and 1848 complaining of the tenants having violated the provisions of the leases by abstaining from working the splint coal, and from the returns made by the tenants to the landlords, in which royalties at the rate of one-tenth were frequently entered in respect of coal wrought from the 1798 leasehold.*

* Down to 1864 the returns of royalties made to the landlords distinguished between the coal worked in the 1798 and in the 1832 leaseholds, and the royalties varied from one-seventh to one-eighth or one-tenth. After 1864 the returns made no distinction between the leaseholds, and the royalties entered were at the uniform rate of one-tenth. In 1885 the Carron Company objected that the returns were defective, inter alia, on the ground that they did not distinguish between the output from above and below the day level, and in 1886 they raised an action against Mercer Henderson's trustees, concluding for declarator that, until the coal above the day level in the 1798 leasehold was exhausted, the defenders were bound to pay royalty at the rate of one-seventh of the gross produce of the output from that leasehold, and for payment of £11,303, 12s. 8d. After the case had been twice in the Inner-House and once in the House of Lords, the pursuers in 1894 obtained decree for a certain sum, the Court holding that the royalty due on coal worked in the 1798 leasehold below the day level was one-tenth of the gross produce, on the ground, as expressed by the Lord President, that "the workings in dispute took place with the sanction of the landlord, and on the footing, so far as both parties were concerned, that a royalty of one-tenth was payable." The defenders founded upon the

The evidence further shewed that four pits had been sunk in the 1832 leasehold, viz., the Roundell in 1837, the William in 1844, the George in 1852, and the Alice in 1880. The last named had never been worked, but the others had all been used to work coal in both leaseholds. The cost of the four pits had been about £25,000. It was stated by the defenders' witnesses that two pits, sunk in the proper places, would have sufficed to work the whole coal in the 1832 leasehold, and that the George and William pits, which were the only going pits in either leasehold at the date of the action, would not have been sunk where they were, unless it had been intended to use them for working the coal in both leaseholds. It was proved that in 1861 a dook had been driven sixteen fathoms below the bottom of the William pit, with the object of getting at coal in the 1798 leasehold below the day level, and that mines had been carried from it into the 1798 leasehold for the purpose of working that coal. Two stone mines had also been driven from the George pit into the 1798 leasehold, for the purpose of working coal below the day level. The first of these had been begun in 1878 and completed in 1880, and the second, begun in 1886, had been carried across into the 1798 leasehold in 1890, although in 1888 the pursuers had intimated that they objected to the coal below the day level in the 1798 leasehold being worked until the upper seams were exhausted. The expense of these operations had been about £1000 in the case of each pit. The pursuers' witnesses admitted that two pits, if sunk in the most advantageous places, would have sufficed to work the whole coal in the 1832 leasehold, but expressed doubt as to whether, at the time the pits were sunk the lessees' knowledge of the coalfield was sufficient to have enabled them to select the sites for their pits with such propriety. They alleged that there still existed considerable areas of coal in the leasehold of 1832 which could be worked by the George and William pits, and that the defenders had already been fully recouped for their outlay in connection with these pits and the mines driven from them to the lower seams of coal in the leasehold of 1798.

opinions delivered in this case in the House of Lords and Court of Session, as deciding that they were entitled to work the coal below the day level in the 1798 leasehold before the coal above that level was exhausted. These opinions are printed in the session papers in this case.

* "OPINION.—(After referring to the previous action between the parties —see note on p. 1045)—The present action has been brought not to raise any further question with respect to the past, but to determine and regulate the order and mode of working for the future. And with respect to that matter, what I have first to consider is, what is the just construction of the lease of 1798, confining attention to its terms, and construing it as if the question had arisen say in the year 1798 when it was made?

"Now, I must observe in the outset that this question has not hitherto been decided. There have been opinions expressed, or rather indicated, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, which are of course entitled to great weight; but there has been no decision. Moreover, the opinions indicated have been, as I read them, conflicting. I must therefore endeavour to construe the lease according to the best judgment I can myself form.

"I do not recite the clauses of the lease on which the question turns. They are by this time familiar to us all, and up to a certain point all parties are, I think, at one as to their effect. It is conceded on all hands that the

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The whole coal in the lands described in the 1798 lease was let from the beginning, and the lessees were empowered to sublet any part of it. There was no express prohibition of working below the day level until the coal above that level had been exhausted, and the stipulation that the working of the splint should be proportioned to that of the other seams could only be implemented by means of simultaneous working. The necessary conclusion was that simultaneous working was authorised, even although the stipulations with regard to rents and royalties seemed to proceed on the footing that the upper coal would be worked out before the lower coal was touched. A consideration of the lease of 1832, and of the actings of parties since the year 1828, demonstrated that the parties had themselves construed the lease in the way now contended for, and if the lease was ambiguous in its terms, the Court should give effect to the construction upon which the parties themselves had acted. (2) Assuming that the lease of 1798 did not authorise simultaneous working, it had been altered in this respect by the lease of 1832, which laid on the lessees the obligation to sink a pit to the splint coal which was below the day lease does not contemplate simultaneous working, but, on the contrary, contemplates that the upper—the 'level free' seams—should be worked out first. That seems to be common ground. But as to the inference to be drawn, there are two views.

"The pursuers say that the just inference is that both parties were agreed that simultaneous working should not occur—in other words, that while the whole coal was let, it was an implied condition of the lease that it should be worked in two stages, the coal above the level on certain terms, and the coal below the level on certain other terms. The defenders, on the other hand, say that the just inference is only this, that the parties assumed—erroneously as the event proved—that simultaneous working was impossible,—that is to say, practically impossible, because inconsistent with any interest on the part of the tenants; and they argue that right being given to work out the whole coal without restriction expressed, no restriction can be implied from the omission to fix the rent or lordship payable in an event which was overlooked. That omission they admit creates a difficulty as to the rent or lordship which they have now to pay, but it cannot, they say, affect their right to work out the coal in such manner as is most for their interest.

"Now, I do not say that the question thus raised is free from difficulty, but I have come to be of opinion that so far the pursuers are right. Whatever the motive was (objection by the landlord to simultaneous working, or assumed absence of any interest in the tenant so to work), the fact is, I think, manifest that the parties transacted and adjusted the clauses of the lease on the footing that the upper seams should be worked out before the lower seams were touched. That such was the intention of both parties is, I think, as plain as if it had been expressed; and if the judicial mind is satisfied on the just reading of the instrument that such was their intention, it does not seem to me to be a different proposition to say that such was their agreement.

"If I am right in this, it is not necessary to inquire to what results in law the acceptance of the defenders' view would lead. But I must say that these results would appear to me to be dangerous for the defenders. If they are right that the lease proceeded on an erroneous assumption as to the modes of working possible, then it becomes at least a question whether the lease is not void, or voidable, as having been made under mutual error. Similarly, or rather alternatively, if they are right in holding that for modes of working possible under the lease, and which have been in fact followed, neither rent nor lordship is stipulated, I do not, as at present advised, see level, and to work out the whole coal between the dykes, without distinction as to whether such coal was above or below the day level. A large part of the coal between the dykes was within the leasehold of 1798, and the lease of 1832 therefore necessarily proceeded on the footing that the lessees had a right to work the coal below the day level in the old leasehold. (3) In any event, the actings of parties, both before and after the pursuers acquired the property, necessarily implied an agreement to alter the lease, and entitled the defenders to continue simultaneous working above and below the day level in the 1798 leasehold. The pursuers and their predecessors had permitted the lessees to work below that level for a long series of years, and to incur expense in sinking pits and driving mines with a view to such working in the future. Matters could not now be restored to their original position, and the proof shewed that serious loss would be inflicted upon the defenders, if the lease were now to be rigidly enforced. The pursuers therefore were not now entitled to object to simultaneous working. An agreement to vary the terms of a written agreement might be presumed from the actings and transactions of parties,[1] and such an

how the lease in question can be a good lease, or at least a lease binding under the Act 1449 on singular successors. The suggestion no doubt is that the contract of lease having been partly executed, the absence of a stipulated rent involves merely a reference to the quantum meruit. But I know of no such doctrine as applicable to a claim for future possession, or at all events a claim by a tenant to continue in possession as against the lessor's singular successors.

"I have not overlooked the defenders' argument that simultaneous working must be held as impliedly permitted because the lease contains a clause obliging the tenants as far as possible so to work as to put out a proportional quantity of splint coal. It may be as the defenders allege, that as matters now stand that obligation cannot now be performed without simultaneous working both above and below the level. But if so, it is enough to say that at the time the lease was made the assumption of parties was plainly different. That, as we have seen, is common ground. And accordingly, if the fact be as the defenders say, the only result is that the obligation in question is now impresstable. In point of fact there was no difficulty in procuring sufficient splint above the level down at all events to 1828, and it is a circumstance not without significance that as soon as a deficiency appeared the new lease of 1832 was negotiated—one of the objects of that lease being to provide splint coal to be wrought with the other seams.

"On the whole, therefore, I conclude that the pursuers are right in their construction of the lease of 1798, and that if the conditions of that lease are still in force, the pursuers are entitled to prevail in this part of their action. The defenders, however, allege that with respect to the particular matter in controversy, the conditions of the lease have been abrogated by agreement express or tacit, or by acquiescence by the landlords in the mode of working which is now challenged.

"Now, the law on this subject is so far fairly well settled, and, I think, speaking generally, it may be stated as follows:—(1) A lease may have its provisions varied by a subsequent agreement expressed in a probative writing. That is of course clear. (2) The same result may follow from an improbative written agreement followed by rei interventus; or from a verbal agreement proved by writ or oath and followed by rei interventus.

agreement would be valid in a question with a singular successor. The question with a singular successor under the Act of 1449[1] was, what was the tack existing at the date of the succession? If, as was maintained, the lease had been altered by the actings of parties prior to the date of the succession, the alteration would be held effectual in a question with a singular successor.[2] It was not necessary that a singular successor should have notice of such alteration. Obligations imposed by the custom of an estate were binding on a purchaser of the estate without notice.[3]

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The defenders were not entitled, under the lease of 1798, to work below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted. A mineral lease was not of the same nature as an ordinary lease, but was a privilege to one person to enter upon and remove the property of another during a fixed period upon specified terms.[4] The defenders must shew a licence to take away coal below the day level by simultaneous working above and below that level. The lease contained no conditions relative to simultaneous working, and did not provide for rent or royalty for the lower coal in the case of such working. It therefore necessarily implied that

The rule so far is the same as in the constitution of contracts relating to heritage—Gowans v. Carstairs, 24 D. 382; Walker v. Flint, 1 Macph. 417; Gibson v. Adams, 3 R. 144. (3) A lease may also be altered by a verbal agreement proved by parole if followed by actings contrary to the lease and in pursuance of the agreement. At least it may be so to the effect of justifying or barring challenge of the particular acts done. Bargaddie Coal Company v. Wark, 3 Macq. 467; Kirkpatrick v. Allanshaw Coal Company, 8 R. 327. (4) Apart from express agreement, written or verbal, consent to a particular contravention may be implied from knowledge and non-objection—that is to say, from acquiescence on the part of the landlord, and such acquiescence may be proved by parole—Bargaddie Coal Company v. Wark, supra. (5) Apart also from express agreement, a lease may be altered rebus ipsis et factis—that is to say, it may be altered, both for the past and for the future, by acts of the parties necessarily and unequivocally importing an agreement to alter, and such acts of the parties may be proved by parole—Bargaddie Coal Company v. Wark, supra.

"In the present case the first suggestion is that the lease of 1832, which is of course a probative writing, abrogated by implication the restriction in the lease of 1798. It certainly did so as regards a particular area, viz., that between No. 6 dyke and Dirthill dyke. For it required that within that area the splint coal (which was there under the day level) should be at once worked in both leaseholds. But I am quite unable to hold that, as regards the rest of the 1798 leasehold, any change was made or sanctioned by the lease of 1832. The utmost that can be said is that it was not thought necessary to express in that lease that the provisions which it contained as to working between the dykes were in derogation of the provisions of the prior lease.

"There being thus no written agreement, it has next to be noted that there is no evidence, and, indeed, no proper averment, of any verbal agree-

there was no power to work, and the absence of an express prohibition would not avail the defenders. If as a result of this construction the defenders were unable to proportion the working of the splint seam to the other coal, they would be free of the obligation in that respect laid upon them by the lease. The obligation was qualified by the words "as nearly as possible." (2) The 1798 lease was not modified by the lease of 1832, except in regard to the area between the dykes. (3) The extent to which simultaneous working had been carried on was not as great as the defenders contended, but, assuming it to have been carried on to some extent with the knowledge of the landlord, that would only, on the authority of Wark[1] and other cognate cases bar the pursuers from claiming damages as for breach of contract in the past, but could not bar them from insisting that the stipulations of the lease should be complied with in the future.[2] At all events the pursuers could not be so barred unless it was shewn that the defenders would suffer serious prejudice by being now compelled to comply with the provisions of the lease; but the defenders had failed to prove that they would be so prejudiced. It was not proved that the defenders would have had to sink fewer pits if those sunk in the 1832 leasehold ment. There is thus no need to inquire what would be the result as to future workings of such verbal agreement proved by parole and followed by acts done in pursuance of such agreement.

"Accordingly the defenders' case must depend upon simple acquiescence, or upon acquiescence coupled with facts and circumstances importing necessarily and unequivocally an alteration of the lease rebus ipsis et factis.

"Now, I think it is quite clear that, except as regards the past, mere acquiescence will not do. Acquiescence in—that is to say, tacit consent to—acts done in contravention of a lease may justify those acts, or bar complaint with respect to them, but it can have no effect as to the future. This, I think, was not ultimately disputed.

"The ultimate question therefore comes to be whether both parties to the lease have so transacted and acted as to imply, and necessarily to imply, a final agreement between them that for the whole period still to run of the 1798 lease the coal above and the coal below the day level may, notwithstanding the terms of the lease, be worked simultaneously.

"Now, there is no doubt upon the proof of two things—(1) That the landlord (including the pursuers since their purchase in 1854) knew, or through their engineers had the means of knowing, that coal was being worked in the 1798 leasehold both above and below the day level. (2) That in that knowledge they accepted (without objection on that score) lordships calculated at one-seventh of the produce for the coal above, and one-tenth of the produce for the coal below. On the other hand it is not, in my opinion, proved that any pits were sunk or mines driven specially in connection with the lower level—that is to say, pits or mines which would not have been sunk or driven if the conditions of the lease had been adhered to. I speak with diffidence as to the results of a proof which was so much overloaded, and in which the different issues were so much mixed up. But I do not remember, and cannot find that proof of that kind was even attempted. Certainly if it was so my attention was not drawn to it. Of course the simultaneous workings (admittedly lawful in the 1832 field) were extended into the lower seams in the older field, and the necessary roads and communications were of course made as those workings pro-had not been intended to work coal below the day level in the older leasehold. The defenders had profited by the landlord having allowed them to work in that way, and had been fully recouped for their outlay in driving mines from the one leasehold to the lower seams in the other. It was said that the lease had been altered, but there was no evidence of any agreement to alter it. Such an agreement was not even alleged, the defenders' case being that the lease had been altered by the actings of parties. But mere actings could not alter a written agreement. Taking the view of the law most favourable to the defenders, actings could have no such effect unless they were preceded by and in pursuance of an agreement in writing or words between the parties.[1] Still less could mere actings of parties be founded on as altering a written lease in a question with a singular successor.[2]

gressed. But there is no evidence that these workings thus permitted did not fully recoup the necessary outlay, or that anything was done which would not have been done supposing it had been quite in view that the right to work simultaneously was precarious, and that in course of time it might be the landlord's interest to interfere. Further, I do not find that except by inaction the landlords, particularly the present pursuers, made themselves in any way parties to the workings in question, or any of them. The tenants did what they did, whatever it was, at their own instance and on their own responsibility. I am not, of course, speaking of the arrangements of which the 1832 lease was the upshot. These were made matter of express agreement under that lease.

"These being the facts, can I affirm that they necessarily imply an agreement to abrogate or alter the conditions of the 1798 lease? I am of opinion that I cannot. I think all that the facts necessarily imply is a licence by the landlord to the tenants to do the things which the tenants did do. They do not, I think, necessarily imply an agreement fettering or affecting the landlord's action during the whole period of the lease. In other words, I do not think it necessary, in order to explain what occurred, to postulate any such agreement as the defenders infer. Especially do I hesitate to do so when there is no averment and no suggestion that the subject was ever brought up between the parties, or that any definite terms were ever discussed between them. It would, I think, be highly dangerous if the provisions of a formal lease should be liable to be abrogated by proof of facts and circumstances so plainly equivocal; and in that connection it is not, I think, without importance that the alteration which the defenders suggest is not said to have included any provision for a new fixed rent. Assume that simultaneous working is to be held as sanctioned not for the past only but permanently, what is to happen if the defenders after a time cease to find the working sufficiently profitable? What fixed rent are they to pay? There is none fixed in the lease. The alternative fixed rents in the lease are both inapplicable. That is admitted. And how, that being so, the rent is to be fixed, I have I confess been unable to gather. I think that is a difficulty which in itself militates seriously against the defenders' hypothesis of a permanent alteration of the prescribed mode and order of working.

"I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to declarator and interdict in terms of the first alternative of the first conclusion of their summons. . . ."

of the lease of 1798, the tenant is entitled, without the consent of the landlord, to work the minerals below the day level before the upper minerals have been exhausted, and I am of opinion that he is not.

If the lease be examined as a whole, and the several passages be compared which directly relate to working and to royalties, it is plain that the lease contemplates and provides for the tenant working and paying for—first, the minerals above, and then, when they are worked out, the minerals below the day level. It does not contemplate or provide for the simultaneous working of or payment for both. The smaller royalty to be payable on the more costly working of the lower minerals is expressed as "in lieu of" the higher royalty which, it is assumed, has ceased to be paid. The absence of any provision for payment of any return for any of the lower minerals, worked simultaneously with the upper, presents the strongest possible reason for holding that the contract treats such working as outside its scope.

It is true that the whole coals are let, and that this includes the lower strata. But nothing is more common than to let the whole coal of a field, and then to define the system or order of working; the two provisions are quite consistent, and, in my opinion, we have here a prescribed order of working.

The defenders also founded upon the clause in the lease requiring the tenant to proportion the working of the splint seam as nearly as possible to the other seams; and they say that it is impossible to give effect to this clause, on the pursuers' theory, inasmuch as all the splint coal is below the day level. It is to be observed, however, that while it is true of the splint coal now and for a long time that it is below the day level, this was not so at the date of the lease, or for some years after its date, and the words "as nearly as possible" point to this being a condition which might not in all circumstances be effective.

Assuming, now, that under the terms of the lease of 1798 the tenant was not entitled, without the consent of the landlord, to work the lower minerals until the upper minerals were exhausted, the next question is, Have the pursuers been debarred by anything done by themselves or their predecessors in title from compelling adherence to the lease in the future workings?

I do not consider the lease of 1832 to have had any such effect. I think that its provisions about what has been called the "'tween dykes area" shew that the parties assumed that the tenant was entitled to work both levels simultaneously, and I gave my reasons for so thinking in my former opinion. But, be those reasons as sound as I deem them, they furnish no warrant for holding that this error bound the parties to prosecute the same system of working on a part of the field to which the contract of 1832 itself had no application.

Among the acts and deeds on which the defenders rely the lease of 1832 stands out, not on account of its argumentative avail, which I think small, but because it is a written deed. It has its place, however, also, in the train of conduct on which the defenders found.

I have become very familiar with the various incidents, from 1798 downwards, to which our attention has been called. It may be conceded to the defenders that it is clearly proved that, from a very early period of the lease, coal was wrought in the lower seams, now and again, and to substantial amounts; that not only was this done with the knowledge and consent of the pursuers' predecessors, but that the working of the lower minerals was encouraged by them, and that the same system of working was continued after the pursuers became proprietors and down to the present time. Further, I think it clear in fact that, until the former action was in the House of Lords,[1] neither party had at all considered whether the lease allowed or did not allow the working of the lower minerals. Both parties found it convenient that they should be so worked.

I think that I have put the case of the defenders on this matter fairly, and the question is, What does it avail them in the present action?

The pursuers are not seeking to question, or to make the defenders liable for anything done in the past as having been done in breach of the contract. Their own knowledge and consent would be conclusive against any such claim. But the present question is of the future. Have the pursuers barred themselves from now insisting that the lease shall in future be complied with?

Now, it can hardly be maintained that a permitted deviation from a clause of a lease of itself commits the landlord to continue the like permission all through what may be as in the present lease a very long term. The case must be carried beyond the mere fact of the prohibited act having been allowed to be done with more or less frequency. Whatever be the mode of proof competent, the thing to be proved is an agreement to abrogate for the future one of the terms of the lease.

The primary answer, however, to the defenders' case is that such an agreement can only be proved by writing. None of the cases cited support the defenders. In particular, the difference between the Bargaddie[2] case and the present is too obvious to require further development, except in one aspect, to which I shall presently refer.

I have said that whatever be the competent mode of proof, the thing to be proved is an agreement to abrogate one of the leading conditions of the lease. Now, it may be well to say that, even were the question of competency waived, the history of the coalfield shews that this question was never so much as considered. As I have already said, the parties never adverted to the terms of the lease, and assumed that simultaneous working was within the lease. Further, very much shorter views were taken than applied to the whole remaining term of the lease.

It was argued, however, for the defenders that what had been already done in the way of working, and done with the consent and approval of the landlord, rendered it impossible, without altogether unreasonable loss, now to revert to the scheme of the lease; and that the past permission or tolerance must be held to have implied a consent for the future. The defenders' case under this head (even assuming it to be a legitimate development of the Bargaddie[2] case) fails in fact. All that can be said is that certain mines have been constructed for the lower minerals, which, if those workings must in the meantime be given up, will cease to be remunerative. Even if this general statement were not subject to some criticisms, I should say that the mere fact that some of the defenders' outlay would be made unremunerative by the pursuers reverting to their rights under the lease, could hardly be held to debar them from those rights. The defenders cannot say, to put it at the highest, that the pursuers are more responsible than they are themselves for the departure from the lease, and they must be held to have executed those works at their own risk. But, further, the defenders could only found on the execution of those works by pleading that it would be inequitable to throw on them substantial loss induced by the pursuers' conduct. Now, I do not think that it is proved that the works in question have been unremunerative, even if their working be stopped now. Yet again, one of the stone mines from the George pit, upon which this argument arises, was constructed after intimation by the pursuers that they held the under workings to be illegal.

On these grounds, which I have stated in condensed form, I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to prevail in their leading conclusions.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—Since the case was argued before us I have carefully considered the documentary evidence and proof in order to ascertain whether there is legal evidence of a variation of the conditions of the holding of the tenants of the minerals as expressed in the lease of 1798. As we are agreed in opinion, I do not think it necessary that I should restate the grounds of our decision, which are expressed in your Lordship's opinion. I shall confine myself to the briefest possible statement of my view of the law applicable to such questions. As it is a fundamental principle of our law that rights to land can only be constituted by writing, it follows, in my view, that where a subaltern right is constituted by an owner of land, whether this be a right in perpetuity or a right of tenancy for a term of years, the interests of the superior or owner on the one part, and of the feuar or tenant on the other, will be regulated by the original grant until these rights are altered by an agreement in writing between the parties or their successors in title. I think there is neither principle nor authority to support the proposition that the right of the tenant may be enlarged or restricted otherwise than by an agreement in writing, but of course if there be such an agreement in an informal writing evidence of possession or performance distinctly referable to the new agreement may be used to supply the want of the formalities which are essential when the written title only is relied on.

I think that the generality of the rule that writing is necessary to the constitution of a right in relation to land is in no way affected by the principle recognised in such cases as Wark v. Bargaddie Coal Company,[1] which, as expressed by Lord Cranworth, amounts to no more than this, that if a landlord authorises something to be done in contravention of a lease, the tenant is not liable as for a breach of contract. If, for example, a tenant or feuar is put under obligation not to build on a certain part of his holding, or is to leave intact a barrier between his mine and that of an adjacent tenant or proprietor, or is only to cultivate his field in a particular way, then if he is charged with a breach of his agreement he may prove prout de jure the consent of the landlord to the particular building, or mine, or deviation from the prescribed rotation, as a bar or justification of the alleged breach. But I am unable to admit that this equitable plea should be extended so as to justify acts of the tenant to which the landlord has not given his consent, or so as to warrant the inference that the consent to particular acts amounts to a discharge of the condition for the remaining years of the lease.

The landlord could not in my judgment be entitled to deprive the tenant of the benefit of capital laid out with his consent in developing the estate; and if it could be shewn in the present case that pits had been sunk with the landlord's permission or acquiescence for the working of an area which had not been fully wrought out, I should have thought that the defenders were entitled to follow out their workings to the extent to which the original permission might reasonably be taken to apply. But the existing pits have already been wrought for a period exceeding the usual duration of a mineral lease. Such expenditure in underground mining as has since taken place is in my view nothing more than ordinary mining, and I cannot regard it in the light of capital expended in reliance on a right or permission given to vary the mode of working prescribed by the lease.

With regard to the question how far the consents of the heirs of Mr Wemyss (the contracting party) would be binding on the Carron Company, I should imagine that an alteration of the terms of a lease, if made in writing and acted upon, would be binding on a singular successor for the same reason as the lease itself is binding,—I mean by the effect of the statute. But I do not think that the accounts of royalties which were rendered from time to time by the tenants and accepted as the basis of settlement, nor the letters which were written on behalf of the proprietors inviting the tenants to work the splint coal below the day level, amount to an agreement or consent to discharge the condition which I take to be implied in the lease of 1798, that the working of coal below the level is only to begin after the upper coal is exhausted. I think these writings amount at most to a toleration of simultaneous working above and below the level so long as such working suited the views and wishes of both parties, and such consent to the existing mode of working as Carron Company may be held to have given is of the same character. In our judgment in the previous case, in which we applied the successive rates of royalty specified in the lease to the altered state of circumstances, we gave full effect to the principle that the landlord is not entitled to be indemnified against acts which he has authorised. But I find nothing in what has been done which amounts to the introduction of a new term into the contract of location, or which bars the Carron Company from reverting to the mode of working prescribed by the lease.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

EDINBURGH NORTHERN TRAMWAYS COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Salvesen—C. K. Mackenzie.

GEORGE VILLIERS MANN AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Clyde.

Company—Law-agent's and engineer's expenses incident to passing Act of Parliament—Promoter's remuneration—Trust—Auctor in rem suam—Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. ccxli.), sec. 78.—The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act of 1884 by section 78 enacted that "the company shall pay all costs charges and expenses of and incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of this Act or otherwise in relation thereto."

Held that the engineer and law-agent of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company were not barred from receiving remuneration for professional services rendered by them incident to the preparation for obtaining and passing the company's Act of Parliament, or otherwise in relation thereto, by reason of their being promoters of the Act at the time when such services were rendered.

Observations (per Lord M'Laren and Lord Kincairney) as to the analogy between the positions of an ordinary trustee and a company promoter.

Company—Promoter—Preliminary Expenses—Cost of procuring parliamentary deposit—Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. ccxli.), sec. 78.—The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884, sec. 78, provides that "the company shall pay all costs charges and expenses of and incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of this Act or otherwise in relation thereto." Held that a promoter of a company who had obtained from a bank on his own individual credit the sum required for the parliamentary deposit in connection with the company's Act, was not entitled to charge a commission for so doing against the company.

Process—Remit—Company—Remit to Taxing-Master of the House of Commons to tax promoter's account—Finality of report.—In an action of accounting brought by a public company against one of its promoters, the defender lodged certain counter claims. The account of these lodged by the defender was remitted to the Taxing-Master of the House of Commons, who taxed the account. The pursuer lodged objections to the report, mainly on the ground that the Taxing-Master did not state in detail the method adopted by him in dealing with disputed items. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor remitting these objections to the Taxing-Master. The Court recalled his interlocutor, in respect that it did not appear that the reporter had mistaken the duty entrusted to him, or come to a wrong conclusion on any matter of principle.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Kincairney.

(ANTE, 18 R. 1140, and 20 R. (H. L.) 7.)

In February 1889 the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company brought an action against William Hamilton Beattie, architect and surveyor in Edinburgh, and George V. Mann, S.S.C., concluding, inter alia, for an accounting by them in regard to all moneys, shares, or debentures received by either of them as promoters of the Tramways Company, or in virtue of an agreement entered into between them and the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation on 25th October 1884.

Mr Beattie and Mr Mann were the principal promoters of the Tramways Bill, and afterwards became the engineer and solicitor respectively of the Tramways Company.

On 18th July 1890 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) pronounced an interlocutor finding that the defenders were bound to account to the pursuers for all sums of money, &c., received by them in virtue of the agreement entered into on the 25th October 1884, and appointed them to lodge an account of "all sums which they claim respectively to be entitled to set against the before-mentioned sums of money," &c.

No. 201.

July 15, 1896. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

This interlocutor was afterwards affirmed by the First Division and by the House of Lords.[1]

Thereafter Mr Beattie and Mr Mann lodged accounts, and the tramways company lodged objections thereto, and Mr Beattie and Mr Mann lodged answers to these objections.

At the request of the parties the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) dealt first of all with objection 1, which was as follows:—"The chief ground of the present action is that the defenders Messrs Mann and Beattie were promoters of pursuers' company, and that, as such, they are bound to account to the company for the whole sums of money, debentures, shares, &c., received by them under and by virtue of an agreement with the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, dated 25th October 1884, under which they became entitled to receive from the Cable Corporation the cash, shares, and debentures set forth in account No. 1. The defenders Mann and Beattie, in their answers to the pursuers' statements, admit that they were promoters of the pursuers' company, along with . . . The pursuers maintain that, as such promoters, and as occupying a fiduciary position in relation to the pursuers, the defenders Mann and Beattie are not entitled to charge the pursuers for any professional services rendered by them or by their respective firms or partners, or by any of their copromoters in connection with the obtaining of the pursuers' Act of incorporation, unless such charge is expressly sanctioned by the said Act, and that the said Act does not sanction the payment of remuneration to a promoter. The pursuers accordingly object" to certain specific charges in the defenders' accounts for engineering and legal work done by them respectively.

The defenders, inter alia, founded on the Northern Tramways Company's Act, 1884, section 78.*

On 20th December 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced an interlocutor, by which he found that the defenders were "not barred from charging the pursuers for professional services rendered by them incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of the pursuers' Act, or otherwise in relation thereto, by reason that they were promoters of the said Act at the time when such services were rendered," remitted sundry of the accounts and objections thereto to the Auditor, and to the Taxing-Master of the House of Commons, and found that a remit fell to be made to an Accountant to report on certain other objections, and to a civil engineer to report on objection 11 (see p. 1058, note), with instructions to distinguish in the latter case any charges not incident to the promotion of the Act.†

[1] Mann v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., June 26, 1891, 18 R. 1140, Nov. 29, 1892, 20 R. (H. L.) 7.

* The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. cap. ccxli.), sec. 78, provides that "the company shall pay all costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of this Act, or otherwise in relation thereto."

† "OPINION.—Messrs Mann and Beattie have now, in compliance with Lord Trayner's interlocutor of 18th July 1890, lodged an account of the sums of money, shares, and debentures which they claim to be entitled to set against the considerations received by them from the Patent Cable Tramways Corporation, Limited, under the agreement dated 25th October 1884, but disallowed as promotion money by that interlocutor. The tramway company have lodged objections to these accounts, and parties have been heard in the Procedure Roll on the objections. Parties were agreed

July 15, 1896. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the First Division on 6th March 1894 recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in hoc statu in so far as it found that the defenders were not barred from charging the pursuers for professional charges, on the ground that it was not expedient to determine that question until the accounts were taxed and the claims were before the Court in specific form. Quoad ultra the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and remitted to him to proceed.

The Lord Ordinary thereafter proceeded to dispose of the other objections to the defenders' accounts, including objection 11 (which was concerned with the defender Beattie's account, No. 763 of process) and objection 15.*

that the greater number of these objections cannot be disposed of without inquiry.

"There is, however, one main objection on which both parties desired a judgment, in the belief that the point of law involved could be determined without inquiry, and that the decision of it would materially affect all the other objections.

"The objection is the first, and is this, that Mann and Beattie are not entitled to take credit for their accounts for professional services rendered in obtaining the Act incorporating the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company. Each of these gentlemen has lodged a professional account for services rendered during the promotion of the company, and I am asked to negative absolutely their claims for these accounts, on the ground that, although the services may have been rendered, and may have been beneficial to the company, the accounts cannot be recovered, because Mann and Beattie were promoters of the company when the services were rendered.

"There is no need to make any attempt to define the term 'promoter,' because, whatever limitations may be put on the meaning of the term, there can be no doubt that Mann and Beattie were promoters of the company. They do not dispute it, and the payment to them of £17,000, stipulated to be made to them by the Cable Corporation, under the agreement of 25th October 1884, was disallowed just because it was promotion money.

"Messrs Mann and Beattie rest their claim on the 78th section of the Northern Tramways Company's Act, whereby it is provided that 'the company shall pay all costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of this Act, or otherwise in relation thereto.'

"The argument of the objectors is that a promoter of a company is in law a trustee for the company which he is bringing into existence, and that the whole principles of the law of trust, applicable to the relations between the trustee and the trust-estate, apply to him; and that it is an elementary

* Objection 11.—"The pursuers, without prejudice to their other objections thereto, claim that the account of William Hamilton Beattie, No. 763 of process, be remitted to a competent party for taxation. The defenders are called upon to produce the diaries of the said William Hamilton Beattie, and all memoranda, drawings, plans, specifications, or other writings prepared by him, and also receipts for all outlays, so that the said account may be properly instructed."

Objection 15 was an objection to a sum of £1070 claimed by the defenders as commission for procuring the necessary parliamentary deposit of £5350 in connection with the Act of Parliament. The defenders in answer to this objection explained that they had with others granted a promissory-note to the bank, that by so doing they had incurred a serious risk for the benefit of the company, and been put to expense, and that they had actually paid to the bank as interest and commission £388, 10s.

Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

On 29th March 1894 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) remitted to John Wilson Brodie, C.A., Edinburgh, to report on, inter alia, objection 15, and remitted also "to C. W. Campion, Taxing-Master of the House of Commons, to report on objection 11, with instructions to distinguish in the latter case any charges not incident to the promotion of the pursuers' Act."

In addition to his account, No. 763 of process, which was a summary, and contained no details of the work alleged to have been done by him, Mr Beattie, in compliance with an order by Mr Campion, lodged a detailed statement of particulars, No. 775 of process.

On 24th January 1895 Mr Campion issued the following report:—"In pursuance of the remit by Lord Kincairney, Lord Ordinary . . .

principle in the law of trust, not only that a trustee cannot make a secret profit at the expense of the trust-estate, but also that he cannot be auctor in rem suam, cannot make a traffic of his trust, and cannot charge for any professional services rendered by him to the trust-estate of which he is trustee.

"That these are elementary principles of trust law cannot be questioned, and there can be no doubt that the accounts of Messrs Mann and Beattie must be disallowed, if their position as promoters was precisely that of trustees, and if their charges are not authorised by the 78th section of the Act above quoted.

"The application of these principles of the law of trust to a promoter of a company was considered in the leading case of The Huntington Copper Company v. Henderson, Jan. 12, 1877, 4 R. 294, aff. Nov. 29, 1877, 5 R. (H. L.) p. 1. There, a director of a company, who had been a promoter, was held bound to pay to the company £10,000, which, during the course of the promotion of the company, had been paid to him by the vendors of the concern for the purchase of which the company was promoted and incorporated. He was considered to be a trustee, and therefore not entitled to make a profit at the cost of the company; and it was considered that the £10,000 was truly paid by the company to the vendors, and by the vendors to the promoters. Lord Young, who was Lord Ordinary, put his judgment on the general principle that a trustee shall not, without the knowledge and consent of his constituent, make profit of his office, or take any benefit from the execution of it, or (expressing the doctrine with still greater generality) 'that a man who is charged with the duty of attending to the interests of another shall not bring his own interest in competition with his duty.' In the Inner-House reference was made, particularly by Lord Mure, to the principle that a trustee could not charge for professional services rendered to the trust-estate, and his Lordship clearly indicated his opinion that that rule of trust law was applicable to the case of a promoter which was then under consideration; and I think the objectors are entitled to found on Lord Mure's opinion. But I do not think that the point now raised, viz., whether a promoter is entitled to credit for professional charges, was decided in the Court of Session in the case of The Huntington Copper Company. Neither do I think that any distinct opinion on the point was expressed in the House of Lords. The case of The Huntington Copper Company seems to leave the point now made open, although there were certainly observations made on the Bench to which the objectors are entitled to refer.

"The objectors referred also to The Emma Silver Mining Company v. Grant, 1878, 11 Ch. Div. 918, and Lydney & Wigpool Iron Ore Company v. Bird, 1886, L. R., 33 Ch. Div. 85, in which promoters were held bound to account for promotion-money, but were allowed to take credit, and that on a liberal footing, for their outlays in promoting the company, so that they were held bound to account for their net profits only. The objectors founded on these cases, because nothing but outlay was allowed, and nothing was allowed for services rendered. But it does not appear that in either of these cases any services of the kind had been rendered.

I have, in presence of the parties, taxed the within bill of costs of Mr William Hamilton Beattie, in accordance with the instruction contained in the said remit, and I have allowed the same at the sum of £2494, 1s. 4d., and I have further allowed Mr William Hamilton Beattie the sum of £62, 10s. as costs of the taxation, all which I humbly report to the Lord Ordinary."

This report was indorsed on Mr Beattie's account, No. 763 of process. The amount of the account was £4200, and there was taxed off £1705, 18s. 8d., leaving £2494, 1s. 4d.

Mr Brodie also presented his report in which, inter alia, he referred the claim by the defenders for commission in connection with procuring the parliamentary deposit to the decision of the Court.

"No clause authorising payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of promotion was founded on in any of these cases, and there seems to have been no such clause.

"Had a claim for services been advanced in any of these cases, it seems that it would have been open to the further answer that such services must have been rendered without any contract, because, until a company is incorporated, there is no one with whom a promoter can contract, and therefore no claim for such services in such a case could have been rested on contract. But this difficulty is obviated by the 78th section of the pursuers' Act, a clause which is usual in such statutes, and the object of which appears to be to meet this difficulty.

"The previous judgments in this case leave the present question undecided, although opinions were expressed in the course of the proceedings which certainly appear to be favourable to the objection.

"In these circumstances, it is with no little mistrust that I have come to the conclusion that I cannot sustain the objection.

"I think that the analogy between a trustee and a promoter is defective, and that all the principles and practice applicable to a trustee cannot be applied to a promoter. Mann and Beattie were not in a strict sense trustees when they were engaged in promoting the company. They could not be, because they had no constituent or beneficiary. They were creating the trust, and even the strictest law applicable to trusts does not bar an agent from making professional charges for framing the trust-deed by which he is made a trustee. Again, a promoter may lawfully promote a company for the purpose of selling to it his own property, and a sale by a promoter of his own estate to the company which he promoted might be unobjectionable. To use the language of Lindley, 5th ed. 349,—'It is unsafe to say that any particular person was a promoter of a particular company, and to infer from thence that he is liable to account to it, as if he had been its trustee.' It cannot be affirmed that, during the whole time when a promoter is concerned with the promotion of a company, he is under the disabilities of a trustee. It seems to be a question of circumstances in each particular case when such disabilities begin to attach.

"There is no doubt that a promoter cannot make secret profits, and that all promotion money is illegal. But I cannot affirm that his duties towards the company which he promotes are the same as the duties of a trustee towards the trust-estate, or towards the beneficiaries under the trust law, and I think that it is stretching the analogy of trust law too far to affirm that a promoter can never be paid for his professional services in virtue of a clause which requires the company to pay the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the obtaining of the Act.

"That clause is a clause in favour of promoters chiefly or solely, and it has been decided in England that it is not a clause for the protection of those who render services on the employment of promoters, but of those who have no one to look to except the company when it is brought into existence,—that is to say, of promoters—Wyatt v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1862, 11 C. B. (N. S.) 744; Skegness and St Leonard's Tramways Company, 1888, 41 Ch. Div. 215.

On 12th March 1895 the Lord Ordinary "having heard counsel on Mr Campion's report annexed to No. 763 of process, finds that the said report imports that the whole charges in the account which he has taxed are incident to the promotion of the pursuers' Act: Allows objections to said report to be lodged."

Objections to both reports, and answers thereto, were lodged, the purport of which for the purposes of this report sufficiently appears from the Lord Ordinary's opinion, printed infra.

On 20th March 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced an interlocutor, in which he, inter alia, remitted to Mr Campion to consider and report on the objections by the pursuers to his report, and sustained the objection by the pursuers to the charge of £1070 for commission for procuring the parliamentary deposit.*

"I think that the words 'costs, charges, and expenses' ought to be read as extending beyond outlays. For, according to the cases of The Emma Silver Mining Company and Lydney, supra, outlays would be allowed without the sanction of any such clause, and unless the words go beyond outlays they are ineffectual. The case of Shaw's claim in re Brampton and Longtown Railway Company, 1875, 10 Ch. 177, appears to be in point. In that case a claim of a solicitor, who was promoting a railway company, for professional services rendered by him was allowed against the company. A similar claim was disallowed in Wyatt v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, supra, but there the person making the claim was not the promoter, and it was held that his recourse was against the promoter.

"The right of a promoter to make professional charges under this clause appears distinctly recognised by Lindley, J., who says that in Wyatt v. The Metropolitan Board of Works it was in effect decided 'that only those persons can sue the company upon a clause in the usual form who have incurred expense or bestowed time and trouble in forming the company, and in getting its Acts passed, and who have no other paymasters. For example, solicitors or parliamentary agents who have thus acted, and who have not been employed by other people who are liable to them, can sue the company on such clauses.'—Lindley on Company Law, 5th ed. p. 147.

"On the whole, I come to the conclusion that there is no sufficient authority for applying to the case of a promoter the rule that a trustee cannot be allowed his professional charges, and that such charges may be allowed under the words 'cost, charges, and expenses' in the 78th section of the pursuers' Act.

"There are some of the objections which apparently cannot be disposed of without proof or further admissions. Of these, with, I understand, the assent of the parties, I have reserved consideration. I understand that this interlocutor will be submitted to review, and in that view it may be more convenient that I should not name the accountant or the civil engineer to whom it will be necessary to remit several of the objections."

* "OPINION.— . . . On 24th January 1895 Mr Campion issued his report, which bore that he had taxed Mr Beattie's account in accordance with the instructions contained in the remit, and had allowed it at the sum of £2494, 1s. 4d.

July 15, 1896. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

The pursuers reclaimed against the interlocutors of 20th December 1893 and 20th March 1896, and argued;—(1) A company promoter was in relation to the company which he was promoting in a fiduciary position analogous to that of a trustee in relation to the beneficiaries of the trust. As a trustee was undoubtedly barred from claiming remuneration for his professional services out of the trust-estate, so the promoter was not entitled to claim remuneration for his services out of the estate of the company. He might, like a trustee, claim to be reimbursed for all reasonable outlays and costs of which he was out of pocket, but he was not entitled to make a secret profit, nor could he by making a traffic of the company be auctor in rem suam. This rule was founded upon considerations of public policy, which demanded that one who had a duty to perform should not be at liberty to place himself in a position where his interest would be likely to conflict with his duty.[1] It was true that under the 78th section of the Northern Tramways Act, 1884, a promoter was to be kept indemnis for costs and charges incurred by him in promotion, any information as to the precise nature of the defenders' charges, such as their Lordships in the Inner-House appeared to desiderate.

"Mr Wilson Brodie's report was afterwards lodged. . . .

"I will first deal with Mr Campion's report, to which the pursuers have stated detailed objections. For the defenders, however, it was contended that almost all these objections were foreclosed by the report, and that the remit should be dealt with as a judicial remit, or judicial reference, and that Mr Campion's report was therefore final as to all questions properly falling within the remit. I am not of that opinion. I think that the remit was not of that character, but was of the nature of an ordinary remit to an accountant, whose report is, by our practice, open to review by the Court.

"Some embarrassment, however, was said to be caused by an interlocutor pronounced by me on 12th March 1895, on consideration of a note by the pursuers and answers by the defenders, Nos. 772 and 776 of process. The note craved that the account should be remitted back to Mr Campion, that he might separate from the other items all items which did not properly pertain to the performance by Mr Beattie of professional work as engineer in relation to the obtaining and passing of the pursuers' Act. In their answers to this note the defenders made certain averments as to the manner in which Mr Campion had dealt with the account, and they stated, in particular, that 'while he taxed down the scale of charges he determined that the whole charges contained in the account were charges for professional services, and were, in his judgment, "charges incident to the promotion of the pursuers' Act," and accordingly he was not called on to distinguish any charges not incident to the promotion of the pursuers' Act; and his report bears that he has taxed Mr Beattie's said account in accordance with the instructions contained in the said remit.'

"Considering that note and the answers, with Mr Campion's report, I pronounced the interlocutor of 12th March 1895, by which I found that but the section did not warrant him in asking a commission for his personal labours in promoting the company. (2) Mr Campion was not performing his statutory duty under 10 and 11 Vict. c. 69, as Taxing-Master of the House of Commons, in taxing the account in question. He was acting under a special remit, otherwise he could not have taxed Mr Beattie's account as an engineer, for that was quite outside the scope of his official duty. His report, therefore, was not final and conclusive. The statutory procedure for taking objections to his report was not, however, open to the pursuers, for this was not a statutory remit. The Court, therefore, ought to review, and if necessary, correct the report. It was necessary here, for Mr Campion had dealt erroneously with many of the disputed items. Their treatment depended on legal principle, and Mr Campion had misapplied the law. Unfortunately there was nothing in his report to shew the method he had followed, and there were no materials furnished by it which enabled the pursuers to raise the legal question. A re-remit was therefore necessary. (3) The Lord Ordinary had rightly disallowed the charge for commission. All that the defenders were entitled to retain was the amount of interest, &c., actually paid by them to the bank.

the said report imports that the whole charges in the 'account which he has taxed are incident to the promotion of the pursuers' Act,' and I allowed parties to lodge objections to the report. That interlocutor gave effect to the defenders' contention, and was in accordance with their averments in their answers, No. 776 of process; and it still appears to me that it construed correctly Mr Campion's report. Still, on reconsideration, I can hardly say that I now think it a well-advised interlocutor, or calculated to advance the cause, except in so far as it allowed objections, and I regret having pronounced it. I do not think, however, that it occasions any real difficulty; and I was, as I understood, informed by both parties, notwithstanding the defenders' averments in their answers, No. 776 of process, that whether it correctly interpreted the report or not, it did not correspond with what Mr Campion actually did. Besides, the report does not, as it appears to me, furnish the information which appeared to the Court desirable for the due disposal of the cause. The pursuers' objections to the report and the answers consist of statements and counter statements as to the allowance or disallowance by Mr Campion of various charges. Of course nobody but Mr Campion can tell whether the pursuers or the defenders state the more correctly his mode of dealing with the defenders' account; and I confess I think that it is desirable to know what charges of the character objected to Mr Campion has allowed or disallowed, and also his reason for doing the one or the other. Now, the only mode in which this can possibly be ascertained appears to me to be by remitting the defenders' account back to Mr Campion, with the pursuers' objections and the defenders' answers, and asking him to report on the objections and answers except Nos. I. and X. Objection I. raises a question of law with which the Court must deal, and no explanation is required as to objection X. This course may no doubt involve a good deal of trouble and expense, but it seems essential for the disposal of the cause. I do not consider such a remit inconsistent with the interlocutor of 12th March 1895. . . .

"There are, I think, four items which the reporter [Mr Brodie] has left to be dealt with by the Court, and I think he was right in doing so. . . . Lastly, the charge of £1070 as commission for procuring the parliamentary deposit. For this last charge the defenders adduced no authority, and I am prepared to repel it. I am satisfied that it does not fall under section 78 of the Act, and I think that no inquiry about it is necessary. . . ."

effect that a promoter was in the fiduciary position of a trustee, and liable in all circumstances to the rules regulating a trustee's actions. It could not certainly be deduced from the English authorities. A promoter was not entitled to take up a position of double agency and secret commission, but it was stretching the analogy of trust law too far to affirm that a promoter could never be paid for his professional services in virtue of such a clause as section 78 of the Act. The undernoted cases,[1] and especially Shaw's case, shewed this. In any view, Mann and Beattie could not be said to be trustees in the ordinary sense when they promoted the company, for at that time they had no constituent or beneficiary. The case was clearly outside Lord Gray's[2] case, the doctrine of which was admitted. The question of a promoter's right to credit for professional charges was not decided in the Huntington Copper Company[3] case, and in the Emma Silver Mining Company[4] case, and the Lydney[5] case, no professional services were rendered of the kind rendered in this case. (2) There was no necessity for a second remit to Mr Campion. What had been remitted to him was quite within the scope of his ordinary duty, and no one was better qualified for the work. There was nothing to suggest that he had proceeded under any misconception of the duty entrusted to him. Every detail and particular had been furnished to him. (3) The defenders having risked their private funds for the benefit of the company, were entitled to the commission claimed.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—We are now to dispose of two successive reclaiming notes against interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary disposing of objections to the accounts of the defenders Mann and Beattie for services rendered in connection with obtaining the Act of Parliament under which the Northern Tramways Company was incorporated and empowered to execute certain works, and to carry on the business in which it is engaged.

It is not necessary to refer to the previous history of the litigation further than to say that by a decision of this Court, affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal,[6] it was determined that the defenders were not entitled to take benefit by an agreement under which they claimed to retain a sum of £17,000, which they had received from the Cable Corporation in consideration of relieving that company of their obligation to pay the cost of obtaining the Act of Parliament. Under the 78th section of this Act the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company were empowered to pay the costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the preparing for obtaining and passing the Act, and it is not disputed that the defenders in accounting for the sum of £17,000, which I understand was paid partly in cash and partly by a transfer of shares, are entitled to set off or retain whatever sums they can establish to be due to them as costs and charges falling within the scope of the 78th section.

Accordingly, by the interlocutor of Lord Trayner, dated 18th July 1890, which was adhered to by this Division of the Court, and affirmed on appeal, the defenders were appointed to give in an account of the moneys, shares, &c., received by them under the said agreement, and also an account or accounts of all sums which they claim respectively to be entitled to set against the before-mentioned sums of money, shares, &c.

The case having come to depend before Lord Kincairney, it was maintained on behalf of the pursuers that the defenders were not entitled to remuneration for their services as law-agent and engineer in preparing and obtaining the company's Act of Parliament, but only to repayment of their advances, including sums paid to other professional persons who assisted in the preparation of the bill, and carrying it through its stages.

On 20th December 1893 the Lord Ordinary dealt with these objections, by an interlocutor in which it is found "that the defenders Mann and Beattie are not barred from charging the pursuers for professional services rendered by them incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of the pursuer's Act, or otherwise in relation thereto, by reason that they were promoters of the said Act at the time when such services were rendered." These findings are followed by a remit in which the different heads of the account are referred for audit to professional persons named by the Lord Ordinary.

This interlocutor is the subject of the first of the reclaiming notes under consideration, the reclaiming note which is dated 21st December 1893.

After hearing argument at this stage of the case, we were not disposed to dissent from the legal opinion of the Lord Ordinary on the subject of the rights of promoters to compensation for services rendered under a clause authorising in general terms the payment of costs and charges incident to the obtaining of an Act of Parliament. But the accounts before us had not been taxed, and to some extent the claims depended on disputed matters of fact. The claims were not before us in a shape in which we could distinguish between legitimate and illegitimate charges, and in such circumstances we considered that it was inexpedient to pronounce general findings defining the rights of the defenders in relation to accounts which could not be assumed to represent the actual expenditure of the defenders in money and services.

We therefore recalled the finding which I have quoted hoc statu, and the case went back to the Outer-House for further procedure under the operative part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 20th December 1893.

The accounts have now been reported on by Mr Campion, Taxing-Master of the House Commons, and Mr Wilson Brodie, accountant, to whom different portions of the accounts had been remitted for taxation. Objections to these reports and answers thereto were lodged by the pursuers and defenders respectively, and the interlocutor of 20th March 1896 disposing of these objections is the subject of the second reclaiming note which is under consideration.

July 15, 1896. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann.

Before adverting to the specific objections which the pursuers maintain under this reclaiming note, I may state that the reporter, Mr Campion, in his taxation of the account, has allowed Mr Beattie to take credit for his time and trouble in connection with preparing for and obtaining the bill, including not only professional services as engineer of the undertaking, but a large amount of general agency, and similarly Mr Mann's charges for services as law-agent have been sustained. It may be convenient first to consider the general objection to allowing the defenders to take credit for such charges.

It appears to me that in a case like the present it is necessary to distinguish between the special disability which applies only to trustees, or to persons standing in a quasi-fiduciary position towards beneficiaries whose estates are in their hands for administration, and the more general rule which disentitles any agent or representative person from appropriating to himself a benefit which, according to his duty, he ought to secure for his constituent.

It may not be strictly accurate to describe the promoter of a private bill as an agent for a company which does not exist until the bill becomes an Act; but if Parliament thinks fit to recognise his services in obtaining the Act, and gives him a claim against the company for his costs and charges, I think it is a condition of his claim that he must put himself in the position of an agent for the company which he has promoted, and must regulate his relations towards the company according to the duty of an agent. According to this standard of duty the action of the present defenders in taking the £17,000, which would otherwise have gone to the company, was judged illegal; or rather, the transaction was open to the double objection (1) that it was an application of assets of the company to purposes not authorised by the Act of incorporation; and (2) that it was inconsistent with the duty which the defenders owed to the company that they should accept a sum of money for which they had given no consideration, and which they ought to have secured for the company under the agreement which they made on its behalf. But I do not find in the opinions delivered in the House of Lords, or in this Court, any expressions which imply that the defenders were disentitled to fair professional remuneration for services of which the company had the benefit. To say that they were trustees is to assume the question. Persons who agree to act as trustees are understood to give their services gratuitously, and it may very well be that even when Parliament has authorised the payment of the expenses of obtaining an Estate Act, such authorisation will not be construed as creating an exception to the rule that accepting trustees have no claim to professional remuneration. This I take to be the ground of judgment in the case of Lord Gray.[1] But in the present case there is no trust. The defenders never agreed to undertake any fiduciary duties that I know of, and I venture to think that it is only in a very remote and unreal sense that the language of trust law can be used with reference to the relation of a company to its promoters. I think that the services of promoters, and especially these professional services, are fairly within the scope of such a clause as this 78th section, which authorises the payment of costs and charges connected with obtaining the Act.

On the subject of the decisions which touch this point, I have nothing material to add, because I agree in the Lord Ordinary's statement of their import. The cases fall under two heads; those which relate to parliamentary companies, where the payment of costs and charges is authorised by the Act, and cases of registered companies where the preliminary expenses are usually provided for by a contract of which notice is given in the company's prospectus, or sometimes by the terms of the memorandum of association. It has been considered that in the absence of such express agreement or authority the payment of preliminary expenses would not be a legitimate application of the company's money.

The cases falling under the first head are, Wyatt v. Metropolitan Board of Works,[1] re Brampton and Longtown Railway Company,[2] and Skegness and St Leonards Tramways Company.[3] In these cases the principle is recognised that the usual indemnity clause in a private Act of Parliament is designed to empower the company to indemnify solicitors and others who have given their time and money in promoting the formation of the company and in obtaining its Act. The Lord Ordinary's view of the cases is also supported by the high authority of Lord Justice Lindley, who (in the passage cited) says that parliamentary agents who have thus acted, and who have not been employed by other people who are liable to them, can sue the company on such claims. I do not understand his Lordship to exclude from the contemplation of the usual statutory clause the case of solicitors who have a guarantee, but it is right that I should say that in my apprehension the question in such cases is, whether the bill of costs represents costs incurred in preparing for and obtaining the Act, and that it is not a good answer to the claim to say either that the claimant holds a guarantee from the promoters of the company, or that he is himself in the position of a promoter.

I pass now to the objections which have been stated to certain findings in the second of the interlocutors under review. I have already mentioned that the Lord Ordinary, giving effect to our wish for further information regarding these accounts, had made certain remits for purposes of taxation. Inter alia, by interlocutor, dated 13th June 1894, the account of Mr William Hamilton Beattie was remitted for taxation to Mr Campion, Taxing-Master of the House of Commons. Print G (May 26, 1896) contains the account, with Mr Campion's taxation in a separate red-letter column, and his certificate appended thereto, allowing the sum of £2494, 1s. 4d., together with £62, 10s. as costs of the taxation.

Objections to this account were lodged on behalf of the pursuers, and by the first head of the interlocutor under consideration, the Lord Ordinary has remitted to Mr Campion to consider and report on these objections. I am very clearly of opinion, in common I believe with all your Lordships, that sufficient cause has not been shewn for sending back the account to the Taxing-Master for reconsideration, though I do not say that this might not be done if it could be shewn that the Taxing-Master had made a mistake as to the nature of the duty entrusted to him, or had come to wrong conclusions on some matter of principle. If, for example, it should be held that Mr Beattie was not entitled to remuneration for time and trouble, it would be necessary that the account should be reconsidered on that basis. I observe that the account on which the certificate is written only sets forth the heads of Mr Beattie's claim for outlay and professional services; but for the purposes of taxation, Mr Campion was furnished with a statement of particulars in which the work done day by day is recorded with the number of hours occupied in the performance of each piece of business. It is admitted that the parties were heard by Mr Campion with reference to this statement of particulars, and it is not said that the account was not taxed according to the practice of the Taxing-Master's office.

Now, this is not an account, like that of a solicitor, to which a table of fees can be applied, and I may safely affirm that no two persons taxing such an account independently could (unless by accident) arrive at the same numerical result, though, if they were qualified by experience, these limitations might not differ very widely. I am not satisfied that the method of taxation employed differs from what would be employed by our Auditor; but if it does, it must be remembered that this is a case of a remit to a public officer accustomed to tax accounts of this description, and that a true result is most likely to be reached by leaving him free to proceed according to methods which in his experience have been found to be best.

I do not think it is a good objection to the report that it does not distinguish or point out "charges not incident to the promotion of the pursuer's Act," because I assume that such charges, if any, were disallowed; and again, I think it is not a good objection to the report that "it fails to furnish information as to the precise nature of the defenders' charges," i.e., the entries in the account, because this information is furnished by the detailed account on which the report proceeds. I apprehend that the Lord Ordinary desired this information, not so much for the satisfaction of his own mind, but rather in view of the wish expressed by this Division of the Court for further information, and if your Lordships agree with me on the question first considered, it is not now necessary that we should have the particulars of the professional charges allowed by Mr Campion. But if the reasons clearly stated by his Lordship, and supported by counsel in the argument addressed to us, are insufficient to displace the presumption in favour of a report which is evidently the result of very careful consideration, it follows that the report should now be approved. The account claimed amounts to £4200. From this there has been taxed off £1705, 18s. 8d., and I think we should approve of the allowance of £2494, 1s. 4d. as the taxed amount of the bill of costs, with the further sum of £62, 10s. as costs of the taxation.

The Lord Ordinary next deals with the report of Mr Wilson Brodie, and the objections thereto. Subject to any explanations which your Lordships may desire from counsel as to unvouched items which his Lordship has held to be a subject of proof, I am entirely satisfied as to the correctness of these findings. The parties have already had an opportunity of making representations before the Lord Ordinary against the findings of Mr Brodie, and I do not propose to go over these objections seriatim, because I do not think we should encourage reclamations against the decisions of a Judge in matters of mere account. I shall only refer to one point, which seems to me to raise a question of principle, I mean the pursuers' objection to the charge of £1070 for procuring the parliamentary deposit, an objection which was very properly referred by the accountant to the decision of the Lord Ordinary and the Court. The deposit was obtained by an advance from the Union Bank on a promissory-note signed by seven obligants, including the defenders Mann and Beattie. The deposit has now been repaid. The charge for commission is defended on the ground that the defenders risked their money for the benefit of the company which they sought to bring into existence. Supposing the risk to have a real existence, I think this is a risk which the defenders voluntarily took on themselves, and is not a charge of the nature contemplated by the 78th section. I presume that the deposit is required as a guarantee that there is a body of subscribers to the undertaking possessed of means, and that the time of Parliament may not be occupied in considering speculative schemes for which money is not likely to be found. In the ordinary course of such business, the deposit would be provided by the subscribers in proportion to their prospective interests in the undertaking, and then no commission for obtaining the money would be required. But if the money is obtained from bankers, the shareholders ought not, in my opinion, to be called on to meet a charge which would not have been incurred if the money had been found in the ordinary way.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD ADAM, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor finding "that the defenders Mann and Beattie are not barred from charging the pursuers for professional services rendered by them incident to the preparation for obtaining and passing of the pursuers' Act, or otherwise in relation thereto, by reason that they were promoters of the said Act at the time when such services were rendered, and to that extent and effect adhere to the interlocutor of 20th December 1893: Recall the said interlocutor of 20th March 1896, in so far as it remits to Mr Campion to consider and report upon the objections by the pursuers . . . to his report . . . Recall also the said interlocutor in so far as it sustains the objection by the pursuers to the charge of £1070 for procuring the parliamentary deposit, and disallows said charge: Repel the said objections of the pursuers, No. 777 of process, to the said report by Mr Campion, on the account of Mr William Hamilton Beattie, No. 763 of process: Approve of the said report: Find that in terms thereof the defenders are entitled in the accounting in the present action to credit for the sum of £2494, 1s. 4d., being the taxed amount of said account: . . . Find that the defenders are also entitled in the accounting to take credit for the commissions paid by them to the Union Bank of Scotland, Limited, in connection with the said parliamentary deposit, with interest thereon at such rate as may be allowed in the accounting," &c.

Trust—Administration—Application for directions of Court—Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 39), sec. 18.—Under section 18 of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889, it is competent for testamentary trustees to apply to the Court for an order on the Accountant to superintend their administration of the trust-estate, "in so far as it relates to the investment of the estate, and the distribution thereof," and if such order be granted, the Accountant may, if he thinks fit, report to the Court upon any question that may arise in the administration of the estate, "with regard to any of the foresaid matters," and obtain the directions of the Court thereupon.

Held that it was not competent for the Court, upon a report by the Accountant under the above section, to give directions as to whether trustees should or should not delay to sell heritable estate, which the testator had directed them to sell at such time as they thought advantageous or expedient, that not being a question which related to the investment or to the distribution of the estate.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Pearson.

THE Right Honourable North Hamilton Dalrymple, ninth Earl of Stair, died on 6th November 1864, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed to trustees, inter alia, the estate of Cleland in Lanarkshire. After making sundry other provisions, he directed the trustees to sell the said estate at such time as they thought advantageous or expedient, and apply the proceeds, after paying or providing for the other trust purposes, in the purchase of lands to be entailed on his second son, George Grey Dalrymple, and the heirs whatsoever of his body, whom failing, to his eldest son and other substitute heirs. The income was to be paid after George Grey Dalrymple attained the age of twenty-five years, or after his death and during the subsistence of the trust, to the person who, if the trust had come to an end by the fulfilment of all the purposes thereof, would for the time be entitled to the rents of the lands directed to be entailed, but so long as the estate of Cleland remained unsold, one-half of the free rents or proceeds of the minerals in that estate was to be held and added to capital.

The trust came into operation in 1864.

In 1895 the trustees resolved to take advantage of the power conferred by section 18 of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889,* and accordingly they presented a petition to the Court for an order under

* That section enacts,—"Section 166 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, shall be and is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof be it enacted that where a person deceased has left a settlement appointing trustees or other persons with power to manage his estate, it shall be competent for such trustees or other persons to apply to the Court of Session for an order on the Accountant to superintend their administration of the estate, in so far as it relates to the investment of the estate and the distribution thereof among the creditors of the deceased and the beneficiaries under the settlement, and the Court may grant such order accordingly; and if such order be granted, the Accountant shall annually examine and audit the accounts of such trustees or other persons, and at any time, if he thinks fit, he may report to the Court upon any question that may arise in the administration of the estate with regard to any of the foresaid matters, and obtain the directions of the Court thereupon."

that section upon the Accountant to superintend the administration of the trust. The petition was granted.

At this date Cleland had not been sold, and on 11th December 1895 the Accountant reported to the Court for directions as to whether the terms of the Thellusson Act did or did not apply to the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement, directing the trustees to accumulate one-half of the proceeds of the minerals in the estate of Cleland.

On 14th January 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) decided that the Thellusson Act did apply, and that George Grey Dalrymple was, at the expiry of the period of twenty-one years, entitled to the whole rents and proceeds of that estate.

Thereafter the trustees took steps to have the estate of Cleland valued with a view to its sale, but they were advised by a mining engineer whom they consulted to delay the sale for a time, until the lower seams could be effectually proved.

The trustees accordingly asked the Accountant to report to the Court for directions as to whether they should at once proceed to realise the estate of Cleland, or should delay its sale until the lower seams were proved, and the Accountant presented a report in accordance with their request.

On 1st July 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson) reported the petition to the First Division.*

* "OPINION.—This application raises a new and wide question touching the scope of a recent statute (The Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889), and the relations established by that statute between the Court and all trusts which may be brought under its superintendence. . . .

"The question I have to report is, whether the matter thus reported by the Accountant falls within the scope of the 18th section of the Judicial Factors Act, 1889. In my opinion that section ought to receive a favourable construction, and I should not hesitate to aid trustees in matters falling within the scope of it. This application, however, asks for direction on a matter which is not only a question of law, but is peculiarly within the region of discretion. It is the kind of question which would usually be left entirely to the decision of trustees acting honestly, and with the best advice that they can get. The question on the merits is, whether, having regard to the probabilities and possibilities of a certain mineral estate, the rents of which are now paid away under the previous decision as to the application of the income, the trustees ought to sell it now or to keep it? And there is the further question which has been raised on the suggestion of the eminent mining engineers whom the trustees have consulted, viz.:—whether, if they are not to sell it now, they ought to be authorised to spend between £1000 and £2000 of the trust-estate in proving the minerals, with a view to getting a more favourable sale, if they should turn out to be present in workable quantity. Now, the position of trustees, as regards matters falling within the ordinary limits of their discretion, is that they are bound to exercise it on the best advice, and honestly. Here they are aided in the exercise of their discretion by consulting the Messrs Geddes, who are among the foremost mining engineers in Scotland. It is obvious that if the Court is to do anything by way of advising or directing the trustees, so as to keep them safe in the future, it must either accept the report of the men of skill whom the trustees have consulted, or must invite fresh advice. The latter course would probably not advance matters much, and on the other hand, the report and relative letter do not give a very certain sound. While the valuation, which amounts to £26,246, is arrived at apart from the unlet portion of the mineral field, Messrs Geddes' report,

No. 202. July 17, 1896. Earl of Stair's Trustees.

The petitioners argued that the application for the directions of the Court was competent, in respect that it related to the investment and distribution of the estate.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The 18th section of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889, introduces an entirely new and, from the point of view of trustees, a highly beneficial change in the administration of Scotch trusts. It enables the trustees acting under any private trust to obtain immunity for their acts, in the important articles of investment and distribution, by subjecting their administration to the supervision of the Accountant of Court.

It was said at the bar that the section has been sparingly made use of. If so, this must be either because trustees are not so timid of the responsibilities of administration as the complaints of recent years had persuaded the Legislature, or because they have not been informed of the remedy provided. I am not aware of any reason, in regard to expense or otherwise, read as a whole, does not leave out the unlet portion, and in advising the trustees whether they should sell or not, it balances the chances of certain mineral fields presently worked being exhausted against the chances of further minerals being developed. On the balance of these considerations, Messrs Geddes report that they would not advise the trustees to sell the mineral portion of the estate now for a lower sum than £26,000. That report, taken by itself, looks as if Messrs Geddes were prepared to advise a sale if that amount could be got. But the letter which accompanied it contains these words: 'In the whole circumstances I am rather inclined to recommend the trustees to delay the sale for a time, until the lower seams can be effectually proved, as I am satisfied that if they can be developed they will be likely to yield a large income for many years.' Now, I profess myself unable to see how the Court could in any useful way, or to any useful purpose, undertake to direct the trustees in a matter of that sort. It seems to me to be a matter on which the trustees must still exercise their discretion, honestly, and on the best advice they can get; and unless I can find something in the section which clearly imposes such a duty upon the Court, I should hesitate to undertake it. The present petition is, I suppose, one of the earliest presented under this section, and it has already furnished an instance of the usefulness of the statute, for the trustees have obtained the direction of the Court as to the application of the Thellusson Act. But if this application were granted, it seems to me that the Court would be put into the position of directing trustees upon a matter which does not fall within the intention of the statute. As I said before, the 18th section is one which ought to be widely construed; but referring to the words of the section, I doubt whether this particular application is within the limits of it at all. It is limited in its terms to the superintendence of the trustees' administration of the estate by the Accountant, in so far as the administration relates to the investment of the estate and the distribution thereof among the creditors or beneficiaries. The question is, whether I am to direct a sale to be made or to be deferred? That does not relate to distribution among creditors or beneficiaries; though if a sale were directed it might lead up to a stage at which questions as to distribution would arise. Is this, on the other hand, a question of administration relating to the investment of the estate? It is a question as to realisation, and realisation may be for investment or distribution. The region of investment is not reached until after realisation, except in cases where the item proposed to be dealt with is in the ordinary sense one of the trust investments; and I doubt whether that can be predicated of the mineral estate of Cleland."

which should deter honest administrators of a trust from coming under the supervision of the Accountant of Court, and thereby obtaining protection from that responsibility about investments which has frightened so many men away from the office of trustee.

I have said thus much of the importance and beneficence of the Act, because I think that much of its usefulness depends on a distinct understanding of its limits. It does not "throw into Court," to use a popular expression, the whole administration of the trusts coming under its operation. Those trusts go on, on the responsibility of the trustees, except in the matters of investment and distribution, as to which the trustees are entitled to the direction of the Accountant and through him of the Court.

Now, in nine-tenths of the cases which arise, there can be no doubt as to what is within the section, and this is especially so as regards investment. It is purely administrative work. The word distribution seems to touch more controversial matter. Holding, as I do, that the matter now proposed for the direction of the Court is neither investment nor distribution, I am not anxious to define or dogmatise as to the scope of the words. But I think it sufficiently plain that in disposing of matters of distribution, the Court will not, under this section, apply what are really powers of administration to the determination of contentious rights. So long as distribution is more or less plain sailing or consequential the Court will sanction it; but should a conflict of right arise, the Court would presumably relegate it for decision in foro contentioso. In short, the jurisdiction would seem, as Lord M'Laren suggested, to be similar to that exercised by the Court in superintending judicial factors.

Now, the question reported by the Accountant is whether the trustees shall now proceed to sell the estate of Cleland which is vested in them. It is to be observed that the truster expressly directed his trustees to sell certain lands of which Cleland forms part; and I do not know very well why the sale of Cleland has been so long delayed, as the discretion allowed is only the usual one,—at such time as they think advantageous or expedient. It appears, however, that there is something to be said for further delaying the sale in order to prove the lower seams of the minerals (it might be at some expense), with a view to getting a higher price if the minerals were proved to be valuable. The pros and cons of this question may easily be imagined, and shew it to be one of discretion, on which skilled opinion and good judgment in balancing alternatives would be chiefly of account. The matter is, however, further complicated by the effect which the postponement would have on the relative interests of the heirs in possession and the subsequent heirs.

It seems, however, quite clear that this is not a question of investment. The trustees are not even comparing the desirableness of some contemplated investment with the land which they now hold. As the Lord Ordinary says, the stage of investment has not been reached.

On the other hand, I do not see how the question reported by the Accountant is one of distribution. It is true that by the combined action of the trust-disposition and the Thellusson Act, so long as Cleland is unsold the whole of the minerals go to the heir in possession. But that does not affect the quality of the question—sell, or delay selling?

I am therefore for finding that the matter reported does not relate to the investment or distribution of the estate, and with that finding the case would go back to the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM.—Like your Lordship, I am of opinion that the questions raised in this case relate to the administration of the estate as regards neither investment nor distribution. It is on these questions alone that the Court is entitled to give its assistance. I therefore concur with your Lordship both as to this particular case and as to the general purpose of the Act.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am, like all the Judges, anxious to give full effect to the provisions of this Act for the relief of gratuitous trustees; and I think we do give it if we realise as the guiding principle that we should be prepared to give the same assistance to trustees as we would give to the officers of the Court. The Court has always declined to advise a judicial factor as to the exercise of his purely discretionary power. We have not the means of judging the circumstances which render the exercise of a discretion beneficial or the reverse to the trust, and I agree with your Lordship that it was not within the contemplation of the statute that the Court should either assist a trustee in the exercise of a discretion, or decide contentious matters.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the question of the sale of the estate of Cleland submitted is not a question relating to the distribution or investment of the estate, and with that finding remit to the Lord Ordinary . . . Find the trustees entitled to the expenses incurred by them out of the trust-estate."

JOHN CLOUGH, Dundee, was married to Ann Mudie in 1862. On 31st July 1880 they executed the following deed:—"We . . . in order to regulate the succession to our heritable and moveable means and estates after our deaths, have resolved to grant these presents in manner underwritten: Therefore we, the said John Clough and Ann Mudie or Clough, with joint consent and assent, do hereby leave and bequeath, assign, and dispone to the last survivor of us, in liferent for his or her liferent use allenarly, whom failing, to our son, George Mudie Clough, in fee (1) fifteen shares" of a shipping company registered in their joint names; (2) the sum of £200 secured by mortgage in their joint names; (3) the sum of £250 in a heritable bond in their joint names. "Declaring, in the event of the said George Mudie Clough, our son, dying before the last survivor of us without leaving lawful issue and intestate, that the shares and moneys above mentioned shall in such event be divided into two equal parts or shares, one part or share whereof shall be divided equally amongst the children of the late Richard Clough, brother of me, the said John Clough, and the other part or share shall be paid over to James Mudie, brother of me, the said Ann Mudie or Clough, whom failing, equally, share and share alike, between his children: And in regard to the residue of the means and estate belonging to us respectively, we severally leave and bequeath, assign and dispone the same to the last survivor of us: And we severally nominate and appoint the last survivor of us to be executor to the first deceaser . . . And in so far as these presents relate to the shares of said shipping company and moneys to be liferented by the survivor of us are concerned, we hereby mutually declare the same to be irrevocable unless with our joint consent."

Mrs Clough died in 1881.

The son, George Mudie Clough, died intestate and unmarried on 7th June 1889.

On 11th December 1895 James Mudie, Mrs Clough's brother mentioned in the mutual deed, raised this action against John Clough for declarator that the pursuer had a valid and indefeasible vested right and interest in one-half of the investments dealt with in the mutual deed, and further, that the defender was not entitled to revoke the mutual deed so as to affect the pursuer's right and interest thereunder, and for interdict against the defender mortgaging, selling, assigning, or in any way disposing of the said investments to the pursuer's prejudice.

No. 203.

July 17, 1896. Mudie v. Clough.

The pursuer averred that after 1867 Mrs Clough had received £1200 under the will of Mr Small, a granduncle, and that she had no other means. That there was no marriage-contract between the defender and his wife. She never had any means except what fell to her under her said uncle's will. The defender never has had any estate of his own, but he appropriated all that fell to his wife under her said uncle's will, except the portion thereof which was laid out in and formed the investments mentioned in the conclusions of the summons. The defender is not entitled to revoke the said mutual deed. The provisions therein made by him to his wife and the pursuer were contractual. The provision of the said investments, even on the assumption that they were his own property jure mariti, was a remuneratory donation to his said wife and the pursuer, in respect of the funds which he appropriated as above mentioned, and in any event the said provision was no more than a reasonable provision to them in the circumstances in which it was made."

The defender admitted that his wife had received above £1000 from her granduncle, and that the money was invested in their joint names, and that the investments mentioned in the mutual deed were made from this fund, but explained that the money was so invested simply because it was the whole money he possessed, and that it belonged to him jure mariti.

The defender pleaded;—(2) On a sound construction of the said mutual deed, the defender ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) Separatim, in the circumstances condescended on by the defender, he is entitled to revoke the said mutual deed, if so advised, and is therefore entitled to absolvitor.

On 2d June 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Pearson), after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the mutual deed mentioned in the summons is not revocable by the defender: Finds that the pursuer has a vested right in the investments specified in the summons, or their proceeds, to the extent of one-half: Appoints the defender to state in a minute what steps he proposes to take to restore the trust funds and put them in a proper course of administration, and that within eight days: Grants leave to reclaim." *

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Although the money originally belonged to the wife, it became the property of the husband jure mariti. The mutual deed which dealt with it was purely testamentary,

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the facts)—His (the defender's) case is, that the deed is revocable by him as a donation to his wife, that the legacy to her had vested in him jure mariti, and that, therefore, it was he, and not she, that settled the money by the mutual deed. He maintains that, although it be true that she had certain rights against him as regards these funds in respect of section 16 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, yet he conceded to her by the deed all the rights she could possibly have claimed, and remained master of the situation to all other. I do not think this position of the defender is sound. In my opinion, the surroundings shew that it was contractual, and that, in so far as it amounted to a donation, it was dealt with by both parties as a remuneratory donation not to be revoked. The case appears to me to fall within the principle of Kidd (1863), 2 Macph. 227.

"I shall, therefore, find that the deed is not revocable; that the pursuer has a vested right in the specified investments, or their proceeds, to the extent of one-half; and appoint the defender to state in a minute what steps he proposes to take to restore the trust funds, and put them in a proper course of administration."

and was therefore revocable by the surviving husband.[1] The case of Kidd v. Kidd,[2] was distinguishable. In it there was the machinery of a trust and a provision which gave to the children of the marriage an immediate interest. Here there was no trust and no provision for any interest in anyone until the death of the survivor of the spouses. In Kerr v. Ure[3] there was also a trust. The settlement by the husband of the liferent upon his wife was a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and on her death he was entitled to deal with the fund as he pleased.[4] The pursuer took no aid from the provisions of section 16 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861,* for Mrs Clough's only right under that section was to a reasonable provision for her maintenance and support. She could not under it secure rights to her next of kin. The provision which she had accepted was the liferent of the fund, and the husband remaining undivested owner of the fund could at her death deal with it as he pleased.

Argued for the pursuer;—The provisions in the deed in favour of the wife and her brother were intended by the spouses to be a remuneratory donation. The deed was therefore onerous and irrevocable.[5] The provisions were no more than "a reasonable provision" in the sense of section 16 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, and on that ground also the deed was irrevocable. The fact that in commuting her rights the wife had stipulated for the interests of her next of kin rather than for herself, did not affect the question.[6] Stiven's[7] case was entirely different. There the husband had bought the property with his own money, and not with his wife's. In Nicoll's Executors[1] the wife was fiar of the whole moveable estate, and entitled to do what she liked with it.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this action the pursuer seeks first a declaratory decree to the effect that he has an indefeasible vested interest under the mutual deed, to the extent of one-half of certain moveable investments described; and that the defender is not entitled to revoke the mutual deed so as to affect the pursuer's right and interest; and for interdict against his mortgaging, selling, or disposing of said investments to the pursuer's prejudice. The argument advanced for the defender was in effect that the mutual deed, in so far as it put one-half of the property beyond the defender's control, was in substance a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and that the defender was entitled to treat the property as his own.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the pursuer has a vested right in the investments specified in the summons, or their proceeds, to the extent of one-half, and has appointed the defender to state what steps he proposes to take to restore the trust funds and to put them in a proper course of administration.

I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's findings are right, for the reasons which his Lordship has given. It would not, in my view, be a historically correct statement of the law of Scotland at any time since it has been systematised, to say that money acquired by a married woman became so completely the property of the husband that a reasonable postnuptial deed giving equal rights to the heirs of the spouses was revocable as a donation. It is no doubt a fair subject of controversy whether the doctrine of the communio bonorum as expounded by the institutional writers is a sound theory, in the sense of being a true representation of the law regulating the rights of the family in the husband's estate. But as regards the personal estate of the wife at least the theory fairly enough represented the effect of marriage on such estate, because it cannot be said that a wife's estate ever vested in the husband unconditionally. The husband in virtue of his jus mariti had the administration of the wife's estate; but her interest in it was so far recognised that a reasonable postnuptial settlement was binding in a question between the spouses, and was even effectual against the husband's creditors to the extent of affording a provision to the wife after the husband's death.

The surrender of the claim of jus relictæ was regarded as sufficient consideration to support an annuity or life interest to the wife secured out of her estate; and the exclusion of the claim of the wife's next of kin was consideration for such a testamentary provision in their favour, or in favour of selected relations of the wife, as the spouses might agree on.

This principle was no doubt to some extent trenched upon by the 6th section of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, which deprived the wife's next of kin and legatees of all right to a share of the goods in communion. It may be doubted whether the Legislature when it enacted this law was fully informed as to the state of the common law with respect to wives' personal estate, as it can hardly be supposed that it was intended to deprive married women in Scotland of the only vestige of right which they possessed in their personal estates. But this anomalous condition of the law did not long continue. By the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, the husband or his creditors are not to be entitled to claim the wife's money as falling under the jus mariti except on condition of making therefrom a reasonable provision for the support and maintenance of the wife, if a claim therefor be made on her behalf. It is only in case of dispute that the amount is to be determined by the Court, and it follows that if the spouses are agreed, they may themselves apportion the wife's money, so as to secure for her an equitable share of the fund, to be held by her exclusive of the jus mariti. Again, it is not necessary that this provision shall take the form of an annuity. In cases that have come before the Court for decision, it has been held that a capital sum may be set aside as a provision to the wife, which would of course be subject to her testamentary disposition.

In the present case, the spouses have divided the fund equally, giving the fee, in the event of there being no issue of the marriage surviving, in the proportion of one-half to the heirs of each. This seems to me to be according to the statute, and in the case of Kidd v. Kidd,[1] cited by the Lord Ordinary, it is recognised that the statute is a sufficient foundation for a postnuptial settlement of the wife's estate. I am accordingly of opinion that the reclaiming note should be refused.

Property—Feu-contract—Obligation to make road—Jus quæsitum tertio.—By feu-contract, dated in 1871, B's trustees, the first party, disponed two plots of ground, part of the lands of Blochairn, to C D, the second party, their heirs and assignees, "declaring that a street" of 60 feet in breadth should be made along the south of the plots of ground disponed, and that it should be formed upon such levels as the first party or "their successors in the said lands and estate, including any parties who have feued or who may feu or purchase the ground on the opposite side of the said street," and the second party or their foresaids might think fit, "having regard to the continuation of the same eastward, so as conveniently to accommodate the portion of the first party's remaining lands lying . . . to the east of the ground hereby feued." It was further provided that the second party and their foresaids should be bound, whenever required "by the first party or their foresaids, including as aforesaid," to make the one-half of the roadway situated next to the plots of ground thereby disponed. It was further declared that the first party and their foresaids should be entitled to give a power to use the said street, and any others that might be formed by the second party and their foresaids in the ground disponed, to their feuars in the remaining parts of their lands of Blochairn, and that the second party and their foresaids should have power to use any streets which should be formed by the first party or their feuars in the remaining portions of the lands of Blochairn, and the first party bound themselves to insert clauses sufficient to secure those objects in all future conveyances of the lands of Blochairn or parts thereof.

In 1877 B's trustees sold and disponed part of the lands of Blochairn, lying to the east of the ground feued in 1871, to E F, with their "whole rights, title, and interest, present and future, therein." The disposition imposed no obligation upon the disponees to construct any road, and contained no reference to the obligation imposed upon C D by the feu-contract of 1871.

In an action by E F to compel a successor of C D to implement their obligation in the feu-contract of 1871 to make the sixty feet road, held (aff. judgment of Lord Low) that the pursuers had no title to sue, in respect that (1) the disposition in their favour did not contain any assignation of the rights of B's trustees under the feu-contract of 1871; (2) they were not successors of B's trustees in the lands of Blochairn (being their disponees in only a portion thereof), or feuars upon the south side of the proposed sixty feet street; and (3) there existed no mutuality of rights and obligations between them and the vassals under the feu-contract of 1871.

1st Division. Lord Low.

In 1895 William Stevenson, quarrymaster, Glasgow, and others, proprietors of part of the lands of Blochairn, under a disposition granted in 1877 by the trustees of the deceased Sir William Baillie and spouse, raised an action against the Steel Company of Scotland, proprietors of another part of the lands of Blochairn, disponed in a feu-contract by the said trustees in 1871 to Robert Hannay and others, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that the defenders were bound under their feu-contract to make certain roads upon their feu.

The defenders pleaded no title to sue.

The following was the state of the titles of the parties:—

In 1871 the trustees of the deceased Sir William Baillie of Polkemmet and his spouse, proprietors of the lands of Blochairn, entered into a feu-contract by which they feued to Robert Hannay, Robert Hannay junior, and Thomas Hannay, ironmasters in Glasgow, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor, as trustees for their firm of Hannay & Sons, and their assignees, two plots of ground, containing respectively about 6 acres and 36 acres, being part of the lands of Blochairn. The larger plot of ground was bounded both on the east and west by unfeued parts of the lands of Blochairn, and on the south by a portion of the lands, parts of which had been feued.

The feu-contract provided, inter alia;—"But these presents are granted, and the said plots or areas of ground are disponed with and under the reservations, . . . obligations, declarations, and others afterwritten, viz., reserving to the said first party [Baillie's trustees] and their successors in the said lands and estate the whole . . . minerals in the said plots or areas of ground . . . And farther declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that a street of 60 feet in breadth, marked A B C D on the said plan, shall, so far as not already done, be made and formed, extending along the south-by-west and south-south-east boundary of the plot or area of ground in the first place hereby disponed, and along the south-south-east boundary of the plot or area of ground in the second place hereby disponed, with such common sewers and drains therein as the said first parties or their foresaids, including any parties who have feued or who may feu or purchase the ground on the opposite side of the said street, and the second parties, or their foresaids, may consider proper; which street shall be formed of such breadth of roadway and pavements on each side thereof respectively, and the same and the said sewers and drains shall be formed on such levels, as the said first parties or their foresaids, including as aforesaid, and the second parties or their foresaids, may think fit, having regard to the continuation of the same eastward, so as conveniently to accommodate the portion of the first party's remaining lands lying on the north bank of the canal, and to the east of the ground hereby feued."

It was further provided that the roadway, pavements, and drains should be formed in such manner and of such materials as the parties and their foresaids should appoint: "And declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said second party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged, whenever required by the said first party or their foresaids, including as aforesaid, to level, make, form, causeway, and finish, the one half of the roadway of the said street situated next to the said plots or areas of ground hereby disponed, and to make and form the pavement situated on the side thereof . . . so far as extending along the said plots or areas of ground hereby disponed: And also declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that it shall be in the power, either of the said first parties and their foresaids, or their successors in the remaining lands of Blochairn, including any parties who have feued or purchased, or may feu or purchase, the ground on the opposite side of the said street, or of the second party and their foresaids, to make and form the said common sewer and drains . . . whenever they shall think proper so to do, and the said other party, and their foresaids, shall be bound and obliged to repay to the party forming the said sewer and drains, and their foresaids, the one-half of the expenses of forming the said common sewer and drains so far as extending along the said plots or areas of ground hereby disponed; . . . . and also declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the second party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged, with all convenient speed after the execution of these presents, to make and form a street of 60 feet in breadth between the points marked C E F on the said plan, extending along the north-by-east, and east-north-east boundaries of the plot or area of ground in the first place hereby disponed, and along the south-by-west and west-south-west boundaries of the plot or area of ground in the second place hereby disponed; and as soon as the ground lying to the north of the canal and to the east of the ground in the second place hereby disponed, or any portion thereof, is feued, to make and form a street of 60 feet in breadth, between the points marked E G on the said plan, and that with such common sewers and drains therein as the first and the second parties may consider proper, which street shall be formed of such breadth of roadway and pavements on each side thereof respectively, and the same and the said sewer and drain shall be formed on such levels, as the first parties or their foresaids, and the second parties or their foresaids, may think fit, having regard to the continuation of the street E G eastward, so as conveniently to accommodate the portion of the first party's remaining lands lying on the north bank of the canal, and to the east of the ground hereby feued . . ."

Provisions followed as to the manner in which, and the materials with which the roadway, pavements, and drain should be formed, and it was also declared "that in the event of the said first party or their successors, as proprietors of the remaining lands of Blochairn, deeming it expedient themselves to make and form" any part of the said streets and causeway, roadways, or of the pavements, and the common sewers or drains in the streets C E F and E G, or any of them, they should be entitled to do so, and the second party and their foresaids should be bound to repay them one-half of the expense of making the street A B C D, and the whole of the expense of making the streets C E F and E G. "Declaring that the said first party and their foresaids shall be entitled to give a right of access to and a power to use the said streets and common sewers or drains, or the portions thereof from time to time formed, as well as any other streets and common sewers or drains which may be formed by the second party and their foresaids in the plots or areas of ground hereby feued, to their feuars in the remaining parts and portions of their said lands of Blochairn, or to any other parties they may think proper, without being liable in any compensation therefor to the said second party and their foresaids: . . . And further declaring that the said second party and their foresaids shall have right of access and power, so far as the first parties can competently confer the same, to use all streets and common sewers or drains, or portions thereof, which have been or may be formed by the first party or their feuars in the remaining portions of the said lands of Blochairn, without being liable in any compensation therefor to the first party or their successors or their feuars in the said lands; and the first party bind and oblige themselves and their successors to insert clauses sufficient to secure these objects in all the future conveyances to be granted by them or their foresaids of the lands of Blochairn or parts thereof." The whole obligations and declarations before written were declared to be real conditions and qualifications of the grant, and real liens and burdens affecting the ground disponed, and as such were appointed to be validly referred to in all future conveyances and investitures.

In 1877 Baillie's trustees sold and disponed to William Stevenson and others two plots of ground, consisting of 92 and 4 acres respectively, lying to the east of the ground disponed to the Hannays, "together with the parts, pertinents, privileges, and pendicles of the said portions of ground, our whole rights, title, and interest, present and future, therein, and whole buildings and erections thereon, which portions of ground above disponed are parts of All and Whole the lands of Easter and Wester Blochairn . . . more fully described in the prior titles, including both property and superiority of the whole foresaid lands, with the pertinents thereof." The disposition imposed no obligation as to the construction of roads upon the disponees, and contained no reference to the obligation imposed on Messrs Hannay in the feu-contract of 1871. The disposition was recorded on 17th May 1877.

The Messrs Hannay possessed the ground feued to them in 1871 until 1890, when their estates were sequestrated, and the trustee in the sequestration, with consent of the commissioners, executed a renunciation and conveyance of the feu in favour of the trustees of Sir William and Lady Baillie, which was recorded in July 1890.

On 15th November 1890 the trustees of Sir William and Lady Baillie disponed the whole remaining lands of Blochairn, so far as then belonging to them, including the two plots of ground formerly feued to the Hannays, to the Steel Company of Scotland, Limited, to be held of the granters' superiors. The disposition provided that the disponees should be bound to relieve the granters of all obligations undertaken by them in regard to roads and accesses through or in the lands disponed. It contained none of the declarations and provisions as to the streets contained in the feu-contract to the Hannays. The disposition was recorded on 15th November 1890.

Subsequently Baillie's trustees executed a minute of consolidation, which was recorded on 18th November 1890, but it was admitted to be inept.

Prior to the date of the feu-contract in favour of the Hannays the ground to the south of the road marked A B C D on the plan annexed to that contract had been feued out by Baillie's trustees, by feu-contracts dated in 1854 and 1864. These feu-contracts imposed obligations upon the vassals in regard to the construction of a road to the north of their feus.* These feus were acquired in part by the Steel Company of Scotland after the date of the disposition to Stevenson.

In the present action the pursuers concluded for declarator that the defenders were bound to make the roads A B C D, C E F, and E G, so far as not already made, and that, in the event of their failing to do so, the pursuers were entitled to make said roads, and that the defenders were in that event bound to pay to the pursuers the expense thereby incurred.

On 21st May 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) sustained the plea that the pursuers had no title to sue, and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action.†

* The provision contained in the feu-contract of 1854 was as follows:—"And further declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said first party or their foresaids shall be entitled, at any time hereafter they may think proper, to direct and appoint that a street not exceeding 60 feet in breadth shall be made and formed, extending along the north-by-east and north-north-west boundaries of the said plot or area of ground hereby disponed, or any part thereof," . . . and declaring "that the said second party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged, whenever required by the said first party or their foresaids, to level, make, form, causeway, and finish the one half of the roadway of the said street situated next to the said plot," and to form the pavement on that side; "and at one and the same time the said first party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged to level, make, &c., the other half of the roadway of the said street, and the pavement on the other side thereof, so far as extending along the said plot or area of ground hereby disponed." It was also provided that the first party and their foresaids might themselves make the drains, roadway, and pavement, and that, if they did so, the second party and their foresaids should be bound and obliged to repay them the expense so incurred.

The feu-contract of 1864, after imposing upon the vassal the obligation to make one half of a 60 feet road on the northern boundary of the feu whenever required by the superior, provided that "the said first party or their foresaids, or the parties who have feued, or may hereafter feu or purchase the ground on the other side of said street," should be bound at the same time to make the other half of the said roadway.

† "OPINION.— . . . The first question is whether the pursuers have a good title to sue?

"I have already pointed out that the pursuers acquired their lands in 1877, and if the disposition in their favour gives them a title to enforce the obligations against the Messrs Hannay, then I assume that the subsequent renunciation of the feu by Hannays' trustee, and the disposition of the ground, without reference to the streets, to the defenders, could not pre-

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The disposition in the pursuers' favour carried the "whole rights, title, and interest" of Baillie's trustees in the lands disponed. It therefore constituted the pursuers assignees of the right of the trustees to enforce the obligations as to roads contained in the defenders' titles. (2) The pursuers had a jus quæsitum to enforce the obligations in question. The "foresaids," who were by the terms of the Hannays' feu-contract entitled, in addition to the granters themselves, to enforce the obligations as to roads contained in that deed, were the granters' "successors" in the lands of Blochairn. The pursuers had acquired both property and superiority of a great part of these lands, and they were therefore entitled by the express terms of the deed to enforce the obligations in question. Further, it was enough to give them a title to enforce the obligations that they were disponees of the lands intended to be accommodated by the continuation of the roads. To confer a jus quæsitum tertio it was sufficient that there was an expressed or implied intention that the tertius should have the right, judice the pursuers. I shall therefore consider the case as if it had arisen between the pursuers and the Messrs Hannay.

"I shall first deal with the street A B C D. The clause of the contract referring to that street does not commence by laying an obligation upon the feuars to make it, but by a declaration that such a street shall be made, and a description of the character of the street. It is in this part of the clause that it is provided that the street shall be of such a breadth as to accommodate the portion of the first parties' remaining lands 'to the east of the ground hereby feued.' That is the only reference to the ground to the east as distinguished from the other unfeued parts of the lands of Blochairn, and I think that it is not unimportant to observe that it occurs in a part of the clause which lays no obligation on the feuars.

"The obligation which is subsequently laid on the feuars is expressed thus:—'The said second parties and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged, whenever required by the said first parties and their foresaids, including as aforesaid,' to make the one-half of the street next the ground feued to them.

"Now, the foresaids of the first parties there referred to are their successors in the lands of Blochairn, and the words 'including as aforesaid' mean (as shewn by the context) 'including any parties who have feued or may feu or purchase the ground on the opposite side of the street.'

"The pursuers argued that two separate classes of persons were thereby empowered to enforce the obligation—(1) the successors in the lands of Blochairn (which the pursuers claim to be); and (2) the feuars on the opposite side of the proposed street. Whether the feuars on the opposite side of the street would by themselves have a title to enforce the obligation depends upon the meaning of the word 'including.' The defenders argued that that word must be read in the natural sense, and as signifying that the 'foresaids' of Baillie's trustees should mean their successors in the lands, plus the feuars on the opposite side of the street. I do not think it likely that Baillie's trustees should have stipulated that the obligation should not be enforceable by them and their successors alone, but that they should require the concurrence of certain feuars. Further, I notice that in the feu-contract of 1864, which is conceived in practically the same terms as the feu-contract in favour of the Messrs Hannay, an obligation is laid upon 'the first party or their foresaids,' or the parties 'who have feued' ground on the opposite side of the street. I am, therefore, inclined to think that the word 'including' means that the term 'foresaids' shall include the feuars on the opposite side of the street, and that either they or Baillie's trustees and their successors should be entitled to enforce the obligation.

and that he had an interest to enforce the obligation.[1] It was not decided that the tertius must be designated. The doctrine had been given effect to in favour of co-feuars who had not acquired their feus at the date of the contract sought to be enforced.[2]

Argued for the defenders;—The parties stood in no feudal relation to one another, and the obligations sought to be enforced, although conditions of the tenure, were personal obligations. Prima facie obligations of that kind were enforceable only by the superior who imposed them. None of the grounds upon which the pursuers based their claim were established. 1. The disposition in their favour only carried the lands conveyed, and the granters' right, title, and interest "therein," i.e., in the lands conveyed. The right to enforce obligations in the defenders' titles could not be called a right in the lands disponed to the pursuers, and was therefore not carried by the disposition in their favour. 2. No jus quæsitum tertio had been conferred upon the pursuers. Such a right only existed when there was express description of the tertius,[3] or mutuality of obligation. Here neither of these conditions was present. (1) The pursuers were not successors of the Baillie trustees in the lands of Blochairn, but only in a part of them. They were, therefore, not "foresaids" of the trustees in the sense of the Hannays' feu-contract. It was not readily to be inferred that the creditors in obligations of this kind were to be multiplied. (2) No obligations in regard to the formation of roads had been imposed upon the pursuers, and they had no interest to enforce the obligations, because no right to use the streets when made had been conferred upon them.

But that does not help the pursuers, because they are not feuars on the opposite side of the street, nor are they the successors of Baillie's trustees in the lands of Blochairn, but only in a portion thereof. No doubt they have acquired the lands lying to the east of the ground feued to the Hannays, and these are the lands which the street was to be constructed so as to accommodate, but the clause imposing this obligation cannot, in my opinion, be construed so as to limit the expression 'foresaids' to successors in a particular part of the lands of Blochairn. It would have been a different question if the only lands remaining in the hands of the superior had been those to the east, but that was not the case.

"As regarded the street C E F, the Messrs Hannay were taken bound to make it 'with all convenient speed after the execution of these presents.' It was also declared that if the Messrs Hannay failed to make the street, 'the first party, or their successors in the remaining lands of Blochairn,' should be entitled to do so at the expense of the Messrs Hannay. What I have already said applies to this street also. The pursuers are not the successors of Baillie's trustees in the remaining lands of Blochairn.

"The third street, E G, is in the same position as the street C E F, with this exception, that it is declared that it shall be made 'so as conveniently to accommodate the portion of the first party's lands lying to the east of the ground hereby feued.' That however can, in my opinion, make no difference to the title of the pursuers. What I have said in regard to the other streets applies equally to the street E G.

"I am therefore of opinion that the defenders must be assoilzied."

July 17, 1896. Stevenson v. Steel Co. of Scotland, Limited.

LORD KINNEAR.—The pursuers and defenders are respectively proprietors of two adjoining pieces of land in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, and their rights are derived from a common author, the trustees of Sir William Baillie, of Polkemmet. As the titles now stand, Sir William Baillie's trustees are entirely divested of all right and interest in either parcel of land. But the defenders' property was formerly held of the trustees in feu-farm, by virtue of a feu-contract executed in 1871 between them as superiors and Robert and William Hannay and others as feuars; and the purpose of the action is to enforce against the defenders certain conditions of this feu-contract which are said to enure to the benefit of the pursuers as proprietors of the adjoining lands. The defenders are now in right of the superiority, as well as of the dominium utile of the lands feued to the Hannays. But they do not maintain that the obligations in question are extinguished confusione; and in abstaining from stating any plea of this kind, I think they have taken a correct view of their title.

It appears that in July 1890 the subjects set in feu were reconveyed to the superiors by the trustee and commissioners on the sequestrated estate of the vassals. The superiors recorded the disposition in the Register of Sasines. But before taking any steps for consolidating the dominium utile with the superiority, they, in November 1890, disponed the subjects to the defenders, to be held of the granters' superior. The disposition has not been printed, but the parties are agreed as to its import and effect. The defenders recorded the disposition in their favour on the 15th of November, and were thereupon entered, as I understand, with the Crown as superior, under the Titles to Lands Act, 1874. Three days later the disponers recorded a minute of consolidation. But this is admitted to be inept, by reason of the prior infeftment of the defenders. The defenders therefore are not in a position to maintain, as they might have done, had consolidation been validly effected before the disposition in their favour was recorded, that they held the plenum dominium as singular successors under a title which is unaffected by the obligations of the original feuars. The property and superiority are still held as separate estates, and the record has not been cleared of the feu-contract. It follows that, although the mutual rights and liabilities of superior and vassal may be suspended confusione, they have not been extinguished so as to prevent the rights of third persons, if such there be, from being enforced in the same manner as if the feu were still held by the original feuars or their disponees under the feu-contract, and by no other title. I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers, who acquired their lands in 1877, cannot be prejudiced by subsequent alterations of the defenders' title, and that the question must be decided in the same way as if they had brought their action against the Hannays before 1890. But taking the case on that assumption, I am of opinion that they have no right or interest in the Hannays' feu-contract, and no title to enforce any of its stipulations.

The conditions which they claim right to enforce impose obligations on the feuars for the construction of certain streets, and in order to construe these conditions correctly it is necessary to understand the relative positions, both in fact and in point of title, of the various pieces of ground to which they are said to relate. The ground feued to the Hannays was bounded on the south and also on the east by other portions of the Blochairn estate. The ground to the south had been already feued out. The defenders have now acquired both the property and the superiority of the greater part of this ground, and the remainder, extending to three acres or thereby, belongs to the Caledonian Railway Company. But, at the date of the feu-contract in favour of the Hannays, both portions were held in feu of Sir William Baillie's trustees, and they were still so held when the piece of land to the east of the Hannays' feu was acquired by the pursuers. This last portion was never set in feu, but in 1877 it was disponed to the pursuers, who still hold it under a title which contains no reference to the feu-contract with the Hannays, or to any of the obligations which it creates. The pursuers maintain, however, that the mere title to the lands of which they are now in possession carries with it a title to sue upon the defenders' contract, and they allege that by that contract the defenders are bound to form and causeway three separate streets, for the mutual convenience of themselves and the pursuers.

The first of these is a street marked A B C D on a plan extending along the south and south-east boundaries of the plots of ground feued. The precise terms of the contract with reference to this street must be considered; but for a just appreciation of their effect, it is necessary to observe in the first place that by the feu-contracts of the ground to the south it had already been agreed between the superior and the feuars that a street of 60 feet in breadth should be made in this situation, and that the feuars should be bound to make, form, causeway, and finish the one half of the roadway of the said street next to the plots or areas of ground disponed to them respectively. This is an obligation in favour of the superior which he was entitled to enforce for the benefit of the ground to the north, and keeping this in view there is no difficulty in ascertaining the extent of the obligation imposed upon the Hannays when this ground to the north was feued to them. The clause begins with a declaration that a street of 60 feet in breadth shall be made and formed extending along the south and south-east boundaries of the areas in question, with such common sewers and drains therein "as the said first parties or their foresaids," that is, the superiors or their successors in the lands and estate of Blochairn, "including any parties who have feued, or who may feu, or purchase the ground on the opposite side of the said street, and the second parties or their foresaids," that is, the original vassals, and the survivors and heirs of the survivor as trustees for Hannays and their assignees, "may consider proper, which street shall be formed of such breadth of roadway and pavement on each side thereof, and the said sewers and drains shall be formed on such levels, as the said first parties and their foresaids, including as aforesaid, and the second parties or their foresaids, may think fit, having regard to the continuation of the same eastward so as conveniently to accommodate the portion of the first party's remaining lands lying on the north bank of the canal and to the east of the ground hereby feued." So far there is no obligation imposed directly upon the vassal, but there is a very plain indication that the street to be formed is primarily for the accommodation of the ground to the south as well as of the ground feued, and that it may be continued eastward for the accommodation of the superior's land to the east. Then come conditions as to materials and mode of construction, and a provision for arbitration in case of difference, and then follow the words of obligation,—"And declaring as it is hereby expressly provided and declared that the said second party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged, whenever required by the said first party or their foresaids, including as aforesaid, to level, make, form, causeway, and finish the one half of the roadway of the said street situated next to the said plots or areas of ground hereby disponed, and to make and form the pavement situated on the side thereof of the width, on the level, in the manner, and of the materials foresaid, so far as extending along the said plots or areas of ground hereby disponed; and also declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that it shall be in the power either of the said first parties and their foresaids or their successors in the remaining lands of Blochairn, including any parties who have feued or purchased, or may feu or purchase, the ground on the opposite side of the said street, or of the second party and their foresaids, to make and form the said common sewer and drains on the levels, and of the materials, and in the manner before mentioned, whenever they shall think proper so to do, and the said other party and their foresaids shall be bound and obliged to repay to the party forming the said sewer and drains, and their foresaids, the one-half of the" expense, with interest. Now, that is just the counterpart of the obligations which had been already imposed upon the feuars of the ground to the south, and I cannot say that I see any difficulty in construing it. It is an excellent example of the manner in which each of several feuars deriving right from a common superior may acquire a jus quæsitum in the feu-contracts of the others. It does not matter that no feuar is a party to the contract between any other feuar and the superior. Each is taken bound to contribute to the operation, which is intended for the common benefit of all, and right to compel performance as against the second set of feuars is conferred in terms upon the first. It is unnecessary to determine whether the Hannays could have sued in their own name upon the contracts with the feuars to the south, which are conceived in different terms from their own. I assume in favour of the pursuers' argument that their title so to sue might have been supported by reasonable implication from the reference in both contracts to a common scheme of operations for the benefit of both feus. But I am unable to see any ground on which the purchasers of ground to the east can maintain that the same right is conferred upon them. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that they are not within the words by which the possible creditors in the obligation are described in the feu-contract. They are not the successors of the superiors either in the superiority or in the remaining lands of Blochairn. These words cannot be construed to cover an indefinite number of purchasers of separate portions of that estate; and if they could otherwise have been so construed, I think that interpretation would have been excluded by the contrast between the manner in which the land to the east and the land to the south is dealt with in the contract. It is contemplated, as we have seen, that the street may be continued so as to accommodate the land to the east, but there is no obligation either on superior or vassal to continue it; and there is no stipulation in favour of feuars or purchasers of land to the east corresponding to the stipulation in favour of feuars or purchasers of land to the south. When it is intended that purchasers of separate portions of the estate shall have right to enforce the obligations of the feuars, it is so stipulated in express terms, and the inference is that other purchasers for which no such stipulation is made were not intended to have any similar right.

The same reasoning applies to the other streets C E F and E G. The only distinction is that in these cases the obligation is in favour of the superiors and their successors alone, and not of any feuar or purchaser of separate lots.

For these reasons I agree with the Lord Ordinary on the construction of the obligation. But that construction is confirmed by the stipulations with reference to the right of access to and power to use the streets, sewers, and drains. The superiors stipulate that they shall be entitled to give such rights of use and access to "their feuars in the remaining parts and portions of the lands of Blochairn, or to any other parties they may think proper, without being liable in compensation" to the vassals. This is important as an element of construction, because it shews how the parties thought it necessary to describe the feuars of "parts and portions" of the estate when they intended to make stipulations in their favour. But it is also of very material importance for another reason. As a counterpart of the right to be conferred on other feuars, it is declared that "the said second party and their foresaids shall have right of access and power, so far as the first parties can competently confer the same, to use all streets and common sewers or drains, or portions thereof, which have been or may be formed by the first party or their feuars in the remaining portions of the said lands of Blochairn without being liable in any compensation therefor to the first party or their successors or their feuars in the said lands; and the first party bind and oblige themselves and their successors to insert clauses sufficient to secure these objects in all the future conveyances to be granted by them or their foresaids of the lands of Blochairn or parts thereof."

The pursuers' right to make use of the streets if they were made is thus dependent upon its being conferred upon them by the superiors, and they could not validly confer it except upon condition of their imposing a corresponding obligation on the pursuers themselves. But the superiors have conferred no such right upon the pursuers, and they have imposed no such obligation. It follows that the community of rights and obligations which the contract contemplated as possible has not been brought into existence, and the pursuers can have no title or interest to compel the construction of streets which, when they have been constructed, they will not be entitled to use.

The pursuers' counsel relied upon a well-known series of cases with reference to building restrictions. These cases are not directly in point, because the pursuers are not claiming the benefit of a servitude or restriction, but seeking to enforce a personal obligation ad factum præstandum. But the result of the decisions, as the law is laid down by the House of Lords in M'Ritchie v. Hislop,[1] is that to give neighbouring feuars the benefit of restrictions in feu-contracts to which they are strangers, there must be either (1) an express stipulation in their respective contracts with the superior, or (2) a reference in both contracts to a common plan or scheme of building, or (3) an agreement between the feuars themselves. The pursuers' title satisfies none of these conditions.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur. I think that in order to give the pursuer a title to sue he must either have assigned to him the creditor's right in the obligation, or he must shew that by some antecedent contract the pursuer had undertaken to make a road for the alleged debtor's benefit. In such a case the principle of M'Ritchie[1] applies. If the superior puts the adjacent feuar under such an obligation, the person with whom he has agreed to give a right to enforce that obligation will have the benefit of that obligation. The analysis which Lord Kinnear has made of the titles shews to my mind completely that neither of these conditions applies, and therefore that the pursuers' case is not well founded.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

Process—Proof—Parent and Child—Filiation—General averment in defence that pursuer had intercourse with other men—Allowance of proof of averments generally—Competency of specific questions as to such intercourse.—In defence to an action of filiation and aliment relating to an illegitimate child born in December 1895, the defender denied the paternity, and averred "that about 1894 and 1895 the pursuer was indulging in sexual intercourse with several young men living in her own neighbourhood, among them being" three men named, "and that one of them is the father of the child." The parties were allowed a proof "of their respective averments on record."

Held that, whether the averment quoted was irrelevant for want of specification or not, as the defender had been allowed a proof of his averments, he was entitled at the proof to ask the men named in his averment whether they had had intercourse with the pursuer on particular occasions in the period specified.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

IN April 1896 Jane Barr, with consent of her father as her curator and administrator-in-law, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against P. H. Bain for payment of inlying expenses and aliment in respect of a female child to which she had given birth, and of which she alleged he was the father, and for damages for breach of promise of marriage and seduction.

The pursuer averred that on 20th July 1894 the defender had offered to marry her, and she had consented to become his wife; that on 10th March 1895 she, yielding to his importunities, and relying on his promise of marriage, had permitted him to have connection with her, and that in consequence she had given birth to a daughter on 7th December 1895.

The defender denied the pursuer's averments, and further averred;—The defender "believes and avers that about 1894 and 1895 the female pursuer was indulging in sexual intercourse with several young men living in her own neighbourhood, among them being A. M., J. M., and G. M., and that one of these is the father of her child."

On 1st May 1896 the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows both parties a proof of their respective averments on record, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation."

At the proof the pursuer, in cross-examination by the defender, deponed that she knew A. M. and G. M.; that she had met them on certain occasions specified, but that she never, either on these occasions, or at any other time, had had connection with either of them.

A. M., adduced as a witness by the defender, deponed that he was acquainted with the pursuer. "I remember of walking home with her one night about the end of 1893, but I cannot remember the exact date. . . . I sat down by the side of the road with the pursuer. (Q.) Had you connection with the pursuer that night?

"Question objected to.

"Objection sustained."

Witness also spoke to meeting the pursuer on three occasions—in July 1894, on 17th February 1895, and in August 1895—and with reference to each of these occasions the same question was put to him, objecfed to, and the objection sustained.

G. M., adduced by the defender, spoke to meeting the pursuer on the evening of 17th May 1895, and the same question with reference to this meeting was put to him, objected to, and the objection sustained.

On 8th June 1896 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it proved that the defender is the father of the illegitimate child in question, but finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender promised to marry her, or that she was seduced by him: Decerns against the defender for payment of the inlying expenses and aliment sued for: Quoad ultra dismisses the action, and decerns."

The defender appealed, and argued;—The questions ought not to have been disallowed. It might be that more specific notice should have been given on record, but the parties had been allowed a proof of "their respective averments on record," and, apart from the question of notice, no objection could be stated to the competency of the questions.

Argued for the pursuer;—The questions were incompetent. The pursuer was entitled to notice of the time and place of the alleged acts of connection.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender's averment is undoubtedly of a general kind, and I think that a great deal might be said to shew that such an averment should not have been allowed to go to proof. But apparently no objection was taken to that, and no call was made for a more specific statement. The case went to proof on the record as it stood. The pursuer was asked questions as to particular acts of connection with men whose names are given on record, all of which she denied. I think that it was competent for the defender to bring evidence to prove that she had connection on these occasions. I think we must remit the case back to the Sheriff-substitute to receive this evidence.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur.

LORD MONCREIFF.—I think there is no doubt that this evidence is competent. The defender's statement in answer 6 is irrelevant as it stands, and should not have been sent to proof, because it does not name either place or time. But both parties without objection were allowed a proof of the averments on record, and therefore I am of opinion that it was too late for the pursuer to take the objection at the trial. I think, however, both the Sheriff-substitute and this Court, if the case again comes before us, can in deciding the case give weight to the fact that no notice was given.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor appealed against, and remitted the case back to the Sheriff-substitute to take the evidence disallowed at the proof.

THE GLENMORANGIE DISTILLERY COMPANY, LIMITED, was incorporated under the Companies Acts in 1887, the registered capital being £25,000, divided into 2500 shares of £10 each.

In 1895 1200 shares of the nominal capital of the company had been issued.

In July 1895 the directors of the company, upon the requisition of certain shareholders of the company, called an extraordinary general meeting of shareholders for the purpose of considering, inter alia, the following resolution:—"Resolution No. 1.—1200 shares of £10 each of the capital of the company having been already issued to the members, whereby the issued capital now stands at £12,000: Resolved that sanction be given to the directors increasing said capital to the sum of £14,000, and that by the issue to Mr Andrew Maitland, the managing director, of 200 shares of £10 each, upon the following terms and conditions, viz., (1) payment (a) of the sum of £10 in respect of each of said shares, (b) of a premium of £1 in respect of each of said shares, and (c) of interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum upon the cumulo sum of £11 thus payable in respect of each of said shares, from 9th October 1894 until payment; and (2) that said issue be entitled to a dividend equally with the already issued shares as and from 9th October 1894." This resolution was duly carried at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the company held on 14th August 1895, Mr Cameron, bank-agent, Tain, one of the three directors of the company, dissenting.

Thereafter Mr Cameron presented a note of suspension and interdict against the company, Mr Taylor and Mr Maitland, his co-directors, and James Stephen, the secretary of the company, to have the respondents interdicted from acting upon the resolution, and to prevent his co-directors allotting 200 shares of the company to Mr Maitland in terms of the resolution.

The complainer averred that additional capital was not required by the company, but was merely being created in order to give a benefit to Mr Maitland, while what was really accrued dividend on the existing capital was to be made over in part to this favoured director by the last clause of the resolution; that the proposed price at which the shares were to be allotted was grossly inadequate; and that the proposed transaction would be to the prejudice of the existing shareholders and of the company.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The transactions referred to not being reasonably incidental to or within the reasonable scope of the carrying on of the business of the company, but being in the knowledge of the parties at the time prejudicial and injurious to the company as condescended on, are irregular and illegal, and the complainer is entitled to interdict as craved. (2) The said resolution being ultra vires of the shareholders and directors, is invalid and inept.

The respondents denied that the transaction was ultra vires of the shareholders or to the prejudice of the company.

A proof was allowed. The material results of the evidence were as follows:—The company had since 1888 been managed most successfully by Mr Maitland, who was an architect in Tain. The sales had increased during this period from under 10,000 gallons to over 79,000. During the first years of his management Mr Maitland had received no remuneration for his services, but merely travelling expenses. In 1890 he got a salary of £100 per annum, and two years later in addition to his salary a commission on sales. His income in 1895 from this commission amounted to £288. In voting for the resolution complained of, the majority of the shareholders were actuated by the desire to reward Mr Maitland for his past services, to secure his services for the company in the future, and to increase his influence with customers.

The complainer led evidence to the effect that in August 1895 the company was not in need of capital, and that the shares could have been sold at a higher premium than £1. Counter evidence on these points was led for the respondents.

On 22d February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) refused the prayer of the note.*

* "OPINION.—The complainer here is a shareholder of the Glenmorangie Distillery Company, and he seeks to interdict as illegal the carrying out of a certain resolution passed at a certain meeting of the share-

No. 206.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The resolution was ultra vires of the shareholders. A company had no right to issue new shares unless the capital so raised was to be productive. Otherwise the issue was to the prejudice of the existing shareholders. But here the evidence shewed that new capital was not required by this company in August 1895. (2) It was a fatal objection to the resolution that it mixed up two totally different questions, namely, the necessity of raising new capital and the manner of its disposal. (3) Where, as in the present case, the articles of a company contained no regulation in regard to the allotment of new shares to members, they could only, if issued to members at all, be issued pro rata to each.[1] (4) It was doubtful whether a company whose regulations did not expressly permit it had power to vote a gratuity to an official for past services. In Clouston[2] and Newman & Company[3] gratuities to officials had been disallowed. In Hampson[4] and Henderson,[5] where they had been allowed, there was evidence before the Court that such payments were sanctioned by the previous practice of the companies.

holders of the company, whereby the directors were authorised to allot to the respondent, Mr Andrew Maitland (who may be described as the managing director of the company), 200 of the company's unissued shares at a premium of £1 per share—that is to say, £1 per share over their par value.

"The ground of complaint is that the premium was inadequate, so that the shares were allotted at a price below their true value—that there was thus made to Mr Maitland a present of large amount—and that the transaction was not justified by any interest of the company, but was, on the contrary, prejudicial to the company's interests. As the complainer puts it in his amended statement—'The proposed transactions are not reasonably incidental to or within the reasonable or ordinary scope of carrying on the business of the company, but are prejudicial to and will cause loss to the company.'

"The respondents' case, on the other hand, is that Mr Maitland's services had been specially valuable to the company, whose business he had pushed and developed at great expenditure of time and trouble, that it was desired to add to his interest in the concern so as to give him a greater weight with customers, and to encourage him to further exertions in the company's interest, and that the allotment was made with that object, the additional capital being at the time required, and the premium exacted being, if not adequate, at least considered to be so by the shareholders.

"I allowed a proof, because if the complainer's averments were to be taken as true, there was at least a case for consideration. But the proof having been led, the result, in my opinion, is, that the complainer has failed to shew either that the transaction was ultra vires of the company, or that being intra vires, it involved any abuse of power by the majority of the shareholders.

"It is, I think, quite clear that the transaction was not ultra vires. I do

In Hudson[1] it had been laid down that, if shareholders desired to give a gratuity to a director, they should do so by subscribing or giving their own shares. (5) Whether or not a company had power to give gratuities to officials, it had no power to do so by issuing shares at less than their market price to a favoured allottee, or by paying dividend which shares had not earned. Such action was in breach of the rights of the minority of shareholders. It was no valid defence that Mr Maitland's influence with the customers of the company would be increased. (6) The articles of the respondent company contained a regulation as to the mode in which directors were to be remunerated, and any other mode of remuneration was ultra vires of the company.*

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The evidence shewed that additional capital was required by the company. At all events the question whether or not that was the case was one for the shareholders. (2) It might have been more expedient to divide the resolution into not know that it would have been intra vires of the directors. But it was certainly intra vires of the company. It is within a company's power to allot, as the shareholders here did, unissued shares forming part of the authorised capital. It is also within its power to fix the premium, if any, at which such shares shall be issued. It is also within its power to select the allottees; and I know of no disability which attaches to a company making allotments, if it so resolve, to existing shareholders, or to its own directors, or other officials. There is, of course, here no question of issuing shares at a discount, or without full payment in cash. In other words, there is no suggestion that the transaction in any way diminished the capital of the company. Neither is there any room for challenge on the ground that the act of the company was intra vires but irregular. There is no dispute that the meetings were duly called and duly held, and that everything done was done formally and regularly.

"The complainer therefore requires to make out a case of what I have called abuse of power; and I do not doubt that such cases may occur, and that when they do, the Court may interfere. It is always, however, a delicate matter to interfere as between a majority and minority of shareholders of a going company, with respect to matters connected with the conduct of the company's business, and as to which the shareholders have come to a resolution. Prima facie, the shareholders are the best judges of their own affairs, and it is only where it appears that some sinister motive has operated, or that interests other than the interest of the company have plainly prevailed, that the Court will entertain a complaint. The test always is,—Is the thing complained of a thing done in the interest of the company?—or, to put it perhaps more accurately, Is the action of the majority irreconcilable with their having proceeded upon any reasonable view of the company's interest?

"Now, in this point of view, it requires only a glance at the evidence to see that the complainer's case fails. The allotment to Mr Maitland of 200 additional shares was, I see no reason to doubt, a proceeding which was in the interests of the company. I do not doubt that the increase of capital—of which a good deal was said—was a secondary consideration. I have no two, but it could not be said that the resolution was illegal because its form was open to criticism. (3) Shareholders had no right to demand a pro rata allotment of new shares, and there was nothing in the Companies Acts, or in the regulations of this particular company, to render the issue to a selected shareholder illegal. The American case of Reese[1] turned upon the special rules of the corporation there in question. If, therefore, the complainer had any valid objection to the resolution, it could only be on the ground of fraud or unfair dealing. (4) But it was clear from the evidence that there was no ground for any objection of that kind. The motives which prompted the action of the majority of the shareholders were perfectly reasonable. They did not act merely from the desire to give a gratuity to Mr Maitland, but in the belief that what they were doing would advance the interests of the company. But if their action had been prompted solely by a desire to reward Mr Maitland for his past services it would not have been illegal. A company had the right to give gratuities to its officials.[2] In Hudson[3] the question was whether the defendant held certain stock of the company in trust for the company or on his own account. In Clouston[4] the question was whether a company which had transferred its business could award gratuities to its officials out of the transferred assets. It was apparent that these cases had no bearing on the question whether a going company could vote gratuities to its servants. (5) If a company could vote a grant in money, they could do so in shares provided they did not issue these at a discount. The anticipation of the period at which dividend was due was merely another way of giving a present in money. (6) Assuming that the issue of the shares to Mr Maitland was a gratuity, doubt, also, that the shares were worth a premium a good deal larger than £1 per share. It seemed to me, also, that the suggestion of greater weight being desired for canvassing customers was a little fanciful. But Mr Maitland had made the company a success, and, what is more important, he was in the course of making it a greater success; and I cannot imagine anything more natural and reasonable in such circumstances than that the shareholders, having regard to their own interests, should desire to conciliate him,—to attach him to the concern,—and to do so by giving him an additional interest, and therefore an additional motive for active exertion. In any case, the shareholders (the complainer alone dissenting) were of that opinion, and I find no trace in the evidence of any motive which could have influenced them other than their own interest. The case may involve an element of gratuity—perhaps it does. But the gratuity was, I think, largely inspired by a sense of favours to come. In that respect the case differs widely from that of Clouston v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 4 Macph. 207, and other cases of that description. Where a company is being wound up, gratuities to servants and officials may very well be illegal. But a going concern is in a different position.

"On the whole, I see no reason for holding that the shareholders exceeded their powers, or that the majority abused those powers in this transaction. I shall therefore refuse the note of suspension."

Cameron v. Glenmorangie Distillery Co., Limited.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am not surprised that the proceeding complained of has attracted criticism, but I do not think that it is challengeable at law. It is right to add that I see no reason to doubt that the parties to the resolution thought it expedient in the interests of the company. The objection to the resolution is, that it mixes up things which ought to be kept separate, and the mixture of which naturally creates a suspicion of jobbery.

It was lawful to this company to issue the unissued shares of the company at or above par, and if the price were above par, to treat the surplus as profit applicable to the uses of the company, according to its circumstances and requirements. The question, whether shares should be issued and the capital in hand thus added to was a financial question involving no personal questions at all.

It was also in the power of the company to give a gratuity to any of their officials, and that either for services rendered or to be rendered. This is a delicate matter, but one which honest men, such as we have in this case, need not shrink from proposing, so it be done in a distinct and intelligible way, and with full notice to all concerned, why and how much.

I think it unfortunate that these two things, both quite legitimate, were here put into one resolution. The question, do we require more capital? was, as the resolution was framed, inextricably mixed up with the question, ought we not to do something for Maitland? while, according to the respondents' own evidence, no one knew, or knows now, the actual amount of benefit conferred on Mr Maitland, by giving him the shares at the price fixed.

But while I do not applaud this resolution, and think it unbusinesslike, I am satisfied that it was not illegal in any of the things which it did. I think that the company had a right, if it pleased, to select the person to whom the shares should be issued, and it seems intelligible and legitimate to increase the influence of an agent with customers by giving him a larger holding. Again, I think that the reasons for remunerating Mr Maitland for past services were adequate, or at least that the company might well hold them to be so. In substance, it mattered not whether they first sold the shares for what they would bring, and then made a present of the profit to Mr Maitland, or gave them over to him at par, and let him pocket the difference.

A minor objection was stated, which, at first sight, seemed of technical importance, viz., the payment of dividend on a period anterior to the issue of the shares. This again is irregular, but not substantially vicious. The payment was of so much more money which would come out of the general income of the company.

My judgment of course proceeds on the constitution of this company, and I do not wish to be deemed to approve of this mode of issuing and placing shares on a mixed view of the finances of the company and the merits of an influential individual.

I am for adhering.

River—Lease—Lease of water in ponds and "streams leading thereto"—Whether water percolating to pond from spring a "stream."—Under the lease of a distillery the tenant had right to the water in two ponds, "and in the streams leading thereto." A stream from the hills entered the upper pond, which was connected with the lower pond by another stream. A few yards from the lower pond, but not within the lands leased, was a spring, from which water percolated through marshy ground into that pond. After the date of the lease the landlord collected the water from the spring into a tank, and by means of a pipe carried part of this water to the house of another of his tenants, the remainder of the water collected in the tank passing through an overflow pipe into the pond. The tenant of the distillery having brought an action to have the landlord interdicted from interfering with the water from the spring, held after a proof (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the tenant was not entitled to interdict, per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner, on the ground that water percolating from a spring to a pond did not constitute a stream in the sense of the lease, and per Lord Young on the ground that in the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence the tenant had not suffered any prejudice from the landlord's operations.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

BY lease dated September 1889 for thirty-one years from Whitsunday 1889, the trustees of the late Sir George Campbell of Succoth, Baronet, let to Alexander Ferguson, wine and spirit-merchant, Glasgow, "All and Whole the distillery of Tambowie, as presently occupied by David Chrystal, with the house occupied by the Inland Revenue officer, and other two cottages adjoining for workpeople, the land extending to about 13½ acres imperial, and forming part of the fields marked Nos. 99 and 142 on the Ordnance Survey map, and with the two ponds marked Nos. 140 and 134 on the said map, all lying in the parish of New Kirkpatrick and county of Dumbarton, together with right to the water in the said ponds and in the streams leading thereto; . . . reserving the right to the first parties to grant liberty to the agricultural tenant of Tambowie farm to use the water-power for thrashing or churning at all reasonable times, and the use of the water for the steading and for agricultural purposes; but declaring that any water returned by the tenant to the said ponds and to the streams leading thereto shall be returned in a pure state . . . which lease the first parties bind and oblige themselves to warrant to the second party from their own facts and deeds only."

In April 1895 Alexander M'Nab, who had become tenant under the foregoing lease, conform to assignation in his favour dated April 1891, brought a note of suspension and interdict against Sir George Campbell's trustees, praying to have them interdicted from abstracting water from the two ponds mentioned in the lease, "or from any of the streams leading to the said ponds, and from diverting any water from any of the said streams, or interfering in any way with any of the said streams, or with the right which the complainer has, as lessee of the said distillery, under the said lease, to the water in the said two ponds and the streams leading thereto: . . . Further, to ordain the respondents to fill up any trenches or other excavations made on the lands let under the foresaid lease, and to restore the ground near to the said two ponds, and the streams leading thereto, and the said ponds and streams themselves to the same condition in which they respectively were prior to the operations complained of."

The action arose in the following circumstances as appearing from the statements of the parties and from a proof:—A stream flowed from the hills above into the upper pond which was connected with the lower pond by another stream. Several yards from the south-west corner of the lower pond was a small spring, and it was certain operations by the respondents in the way of impounding the water originating from this spring which gave rise to the present proceedings. The complainer averred that this water constituted, if left to the course of nature, a stream or streams leading to the pond in the sense of the lease, and he therefore maintained that the respondents' operations were illegal as being an interference with part of the subjects let to him. The spring in question was not situated in the ground leased with the distillery. The respondents denied that the water originating from the spring constituted a stream leading to the pond in the sense of the lease; and the parties were further at issue on the question whether the complainer was prejudiced by the respondents' operations. With respect to this the complainer averred:—(Stat. 3) " . . . The right to the said ponds, and to the whole water therein, and in the streams leading thereto, are essential to the complainer for the requirements of the said distillery, as the quantity of spirits produced by the said distillery depends entirely upon the amount of water which can be got from the said ponds and from the streams and springs leading thereto. The withdrawal of any water from any of the said streams, as threatened by the respondents, will diminish to a corresponding extent the output of the said distillery, and cause loss to the complainer." The respondents denied this averment.

The ground between the spring and the pond prior to the lease, and to the respondents' operations, was described by certain of the witnesses as being soft, marshy, spongy ground, through which the water from the spring, or some of it, "siped" into the pond. One only of the witnesses, a man named Boyne, who had been manager of the distillery prior to the complainer's tenancy, spoke to there having been any sort of defined channel between the spring and the pond. After the date of the lease, but prior to the complainer's acquisition of it, Galbraith, the tenant of Tambowie farm, in order to drain the marsh, put in a tile drain with an iron pipe three feet long leading into a tub sunk in the ground close to the pond. From this tub he drew water for domestic purposes, while the overflow passed into the pond.

After the complainer acquired the lease, he increased the output of the distillery very considerably, and had thus a larger quantity of draff to dispose of. In order to consume part of the draff and also to dispose of the pot ale, which had previously been sent down the stream—a course to which the lower proprietors objected—he in 1893 and 1894, erected piggeries for about 300 pigs. The sewage from these piggeries ran over the neighbouring fields, and polluted the water supply of another of the respondents' tenants—a blacksmith, whose house was about 160 yards to the east of the piggeries. The blacksmith having complained to the respondents' factor, they carried out the operations at the spring to which the complainer objected. These operations consisted in collecting the water from the spring in a tank, and in carrying part of the water thus collected by pipes to the blacksmith's house, and also to a cottage let to the agricultural tenant and to his garden. The overflow was carried by another pipe into the pond.

The evidence upon the question whether the quantity of water passing into the pond from the overflow pipe was less than had reached the pond before the operations complained of was very conflicting. The most material circumstance founded on by the respondents, to shew that it was not, was that in addition to the water collected in the tank from the spring in question, the water from another spring (from which as it rather appeared the blacksmith's former supply had been derived) was puddled back so that it also passed into the tank. The pipe to the blacksmith's was fitted with a stop-cock.

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The respondents having threatened, in violation of the complainer's rights under the said lease, to withdraw water from one of the streams leading to the said two ponds, in the manner above stated, the complainer is entitled to suspension and interdict and warrant for restoration as craved, with expenses.

The respondents pleaded;—(2) The respondents having, in any view, a right to take water from said ponds and streams for agricultural purposes, the note should be refused, and the respondents found entitled to expenses. (3) The respondents being within their right in carrying on the operations complained of, the note should be refused, and the respondents found entitled to expenses. (4) In any event, as no appreciable injury is threatened to the complainer, interim interdict should be refused.

On 4th February 1896 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that by the lease of Tambowie Distillery granted by the respondents, and to which the complainer has acquired right, the two ponds therein mentioned were let to the lessee, together with the water in the said ponds and in the streams thereto; (2) that the water of the spring situated upon the banks of the lower pond, and which flowed into the pond, was a stream leading into the pond within the meaning of the lease, although the said water did not flow into the pond by any definite or visible channel, but by percolation through marshy ground; (3) that the respondents have interfered with said spring by impounding the water thereof in a cistern for the purpose of providing a supply of water for certain cottages, and that only the overflow from the cistern now passes into the said pond; (4) that a supply of water for the said cottages is not among the uses of the water of the said ponds and streams leading thereto, which the respondents reserved right to make in said lease; (5) that the respondents have failed to prove that their operations have not diminished the supply of water to the said pond to the injury of the complainer: In these circumstances, finds in law that the respondents were not entitled to interfere with the spring, or to divert the water thereof, and that they are bound to remove the said cistern, and restore the ground to its former condition, so that the whole water of said spring shall flow as formerly into the said pond: Therefore, to that extent and effect, sustains the reasons of suspension and interdict, prohibits and discharges the respondents from abstracting water from or interfering with or diverting the said spring, and ordains the respondents to remove the said cistern, and to restore the ground at the place where the said cistern is situated to the condition in which it was prior to the operations complained of, so that the water of the said spring may flow into the said pond as formerly; reserving always, and without prejudice to, the respondents' right, in terms of said lease, to grant liberty to the agricultural tenant of Tambowie farm to use the water power for thrashing or churning at all reasonable times, and to have the use of the water for the steading and for agricultural purposes, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—The first question is whether a certain spring of water is to be regarded as one of the 'streams leading' into the pond to which the complainer is given right by his lease.

"The complainer's occupation of the distillery began in 1891, when he obtained an assignation of the lease which is dated in 1889. The point of time therefore which must be kept in view in determining whether the spring is a 'stream' within the meaning of the lease is 1889. That is of importance, because after 1889, but before the assignation in the complainer's favour, a tile drain was put in connecting the spring with the pond, and through which a stream of water ran from the spring into the pond. Before the drain was put in there was no visible stream from the spring to the pond, but from the lie of the ground the water of the spring undoubtedly found its way through a marsh into the pond.

"In 1889 the output of the distillery was very much smaller than it now is, and there was not the same necessity for economising all the available water, and accordingly I think that very probably Mr Macfarlane was right when he argued that the parties to the lease had not the spring in view when they made the contract. Even, however, if that was the case it would not affect the construction of the lease. Assuming that there was a stream of water within the meaning of the lease, of which the parties did not know, that stream would nevertheless fall within the lease.

"By the lease, two ponds are let to the tenant, 'together with right to the water in the said ponds, and in the streams leading thereto.' That, in my opinion, includes, as between lessor and lessee, all the sources of supply of the ponds. Thus the upper pond is supplied by a stream coming down from the hills, and a stream runs from the upper to the lower pond. I do not think that the lessor could divert a spring by which either of these streams was fed, even although the water of the spring did not find its way into the stream by any defined channel. In like manner, seeing that the water of the spring in question naturally and necessarily flowed into the pond, I do not think that it makes any difference that the flow was not in any defined or visible channel, but was of the nature of percolation.

"If, then, the water of the spring was part of the subjects let to the complainer, prima facie, the respondents were not entitled to interfere with it in spite of the complainer's remonstrances, and the onus lies with them to shew that the complainer has not been prejudiced by their operations.

"The conformation of the ground in the neighbourhood of the spring appears to be peculiar. One spring, which is the strongest of the springs discovered, undoubtedly flowed into the pond, but other springs, rising within a few feet or yards of the first, appear to have been carried by the lie of the ground in an opposite direction. The respondents have formed a cistern into which the first spring is carried, and from the cistern pipes are taken to the blacksmith's house, to a cottage, and to the adjoining farm.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a case of importance to both parties, and we have had a full and I think quite satisfactory argument on both sides presenting the case of the parties respectively before us in a manner which I think enables us to deal with the case now.

The lease of this distillery and a few acres of ground was granted in 1889, and the present complainer acquired right to the distillery in 1891. By the lease his predecessor acquired what he is now in right of—the two ponds marked 140 and 134 on the map referred to in the lease, together

The respondents, however, say that the overflow of the cistern which goes into the pond is not less than the whole natural flow of the spring before their operations, because they have dammed back the water of certain other springs which previously flowed away from the pond, and diverted it also into the cistern. If that was clearly established I think that it would be a good answer to the present complaint, especially as I have little doubt that the old supply to the blacksmith's house was polluted, and a new supply rendered necessary by the discharge of the sewage of the complainer's piggeries."—(His Lordship then considered the evidence on this point.)

"The question upon the evidence is very narrow, but I have come to the conclusion that the respondents have failed to prove that, by interfering with the spring, they have not injured the complainer's water supply. Of course the intention of the respondents was to compensate the complainer for any water drawn out of the cistern by the additional springs which were made to flow in that direction; but it is well known that the effect of operations upon springs of water is uncertain, and I should think that it was especially so at a place where the natural flow of springs, rising within a few yards of each other, is in opposite directions. Further, I am unable to disregard or to explain away the evidence of the complainer and his manager, that the flow into the pond is greatly less than it formerly was.

"The next question is, whether the use which the respondents have made of the water is within the reservation in the lease. The lessor there reserves right 'to grant liberty to the agricultural tenant of Tambowie farm to use the water power for thrashing or churning at all reasonable times, and the use of the water for the steading and for agricultural purposes.'

"I am of opinion that the use which the respondents have made of the spring does not fall within that reservation. The occasion of the respondents' operations was the pollution of the blacksmith's water supply. If it had not been for that the spring would not have been touched, and it is plain that a supply of water to the blacksmith's house is not a supply for the steading or for agricultural purposes. The same thing may, I think, be said in regard to the cottage to which a branch pipe is taken. A branch pipe was also taken to the farmer's garden, but I do not think that that fact aids the respondents. It does not appear that the farmer wanted an additional supply of water, and he says that it is of little use to him now that it is there. It is plain that it is equally convenient for him to draw water with a pail where the spring flows into the pond; indeed, it is apparently more convenient, because the practice is still continued.

"I am, therefore, of opinion that I must pronounce decree in the complainer's favour."

with right to the water in the said ponds and in the streams leading thereto. He proceeded shortly after entering into possession to erect piggeries—very extensive piggeries—upon the ground let to him. His business as a distiller required, as he quite intelligibly explains, that he should have pigs to consume a lot of the draff and refuse which were produced at the distillery, and with some profit to himself. But these piggeries had the effect of polluting in a distressing manner the water which formerly supplied the needs of some tenants of the respondents, particularly a blacksmith, who complained that he must have another supply of water unless this pollution ceased. That led the factor upon the estate to consider how this evil could be remedied, and he appears to have proceeded—I am speaking from the evidence here—very cautiously and circumspectly, and with due attention to the legitimate interests of the parties with whose interests he was concerned, and it appeared to him that he could carry off the water in a pipe through a part of the estate without at all interfering with either of the streams or with the legitimate supply of water to the pond.—(His Lordship then adverted to certain parts of the correspondence between the parties, and also between the complainer and his manager, in the course of which his Lordship observed)—I may say that, without a strict regard to legal rights—strict legal rights—I should be much disposed to stop any wanton or unduly selfish proceedings on the part of a landlord which would interfere with the legitimate interests of a tenant which he knew the tenant had been relying upon, even although it could not be said that he was not proceeding strictly in the exercise of a legal right. It would be a matter to be taken into consideration in an application for interdict to stop him whether the proceedings which he was taking were necessary in his own legitimate interests, and also whether he was paying a due regard to the legitimate interests of the tenant, which he knew he had in view in taking and in keeping the lease.—(His Lordship then further adverted to the correspondence.)

Now, I am disposed, without any antecedent prejudice against the landlord interfering in these circumstances to provide pure fresh water for his tenants, to consider whether he was exceeding his legal right or violating any right—which would of course be exceeding his—which he had granted to a tenant. I keep in view that consideration, and I refer to it in connection with the purpose for which I have read these letters, which was to explain how the landlord was prompted to take action in this matter at all. I may also observe that the lease reserves right to the first parties to grant liberty to the agricultural tenants of Tambowie farm to use the water-power for thrashing or churning at all reasonable times, and the use of the water for the steading and for agricultural purposes. I should be disposed to think that even an interference with the supply to the distillery for the legitimate supply of a house like the smith's house here, whose former supply had been diminished by the distiller's proceedings, would not be unfavourably regarded if it was kept within due bounds, that is, such bounds as were shewn to be necessary in consequence of the pollution of which the distiller was the author. But I am of opinion upon the evidence, and I am speaking now distinctly and directly to the question whether the operations sought to be interdicted interfered with the streams running into the pond or the supply of water theretofore made through these springs to the pond, I am disposed to hold upon the evidence, and that I confess without any serious doubt, that the operations did not so interfere. If that be so, then that is a conclusive answer to this action, for the averment upon which it proceeds is stated in statement 3.—(His Lordship read the averment quoted above.) Now, I cannot affirm that. On the contrary, I am prepared to negative it, and therefore to affirm the respondents' third plea in law, which is to the effect that the whole operations, which are the subject of complaint here, were within their legal right, and were no interference with the complainer's legal rights in a question between them and the complainer. In that view I should be prepared to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and to give a decree to that effect, and, of course, with expenses.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I think there has been no invasion or violation of the complainer's rights. The lease in question lets to the complainer the two ponds with the water therein, and right to the water in the streams leading thereto. The lower of the ponds is fed by a stream (in the ordinary and popular sense of that term) flowing out of the upper pond, and the upper pond is fed by a similar stream flowing from the hill above. To hold that these are the ponds "and streams leading thereto" let to the complainer seems to me to satisfy completely the terms of the lease without looking for anything else as included to which these terms would not, in popular language, directly apply. The spring which the complainer claims, and the interference with which is the immediate subject of complaint, does not appear to me to fall within the subjects let. A spring and a stream are different things. The water from a spring may flow away in a stream, no doubt, and that is said by the complainer to have been the case here. But that is not supported by the evidence. It rather appears that the water from the spring in question simply gathered on the land round the spring, and formed a kind of marsh. That some of that collected water found its way by percolation through the earth into the lower pond, I think, is certain; how much or how little has not been, and probably could not be, ascertained. But I am quite clear that such percolation cannot be regarded as a stream leading into the pond in the sense of the lease.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the terms of the lease as to the streams are completely covered. There were two streams, and that is quite sufficient. There is therefore no ground for suggesting that the word "streams" referred to anything else than the two visible streams upon the field which were therefore to be taken into consideration and disposed of. I think that when you have a stream in the sense of a stream which might be diverted from its course, or the water of it removed, it must be a tangible running stream. It may be very small, but it must have a water channel for itself. I do not think that any question such as was referred to in some of the cases which were cited, viz., the question relating to the water disappearing from a stream underground and reappearing, or not reappearing till it came out at the bottom of a lake, affects the question here. That question really is, whether at the place you are dealing with there is a stream. It may afterwards disappear, and it may afterwards re-emerge. But if any water emerging does not form a stream, but merely a marsh upon the ground with no defined outflow which is visible, then I think that is not water which can be held to fall under the definition of the words in the lease here. It is quite in accordance with the common law upon the matter that a proprietor is entitled to impound and get possession of such water, and to keep it, not being water flowing in a stream upon the surface of his land, and not in fact running down on the surface to the lower ground, or to a pond or lake, or another stream. Although by doing so he may possibly affect the water interests of other heritors further down, perhaps miles down below, nevertheless that is his right.

Upon the whole matter I agree entirely with your Lordships that the complainer has not established that any stream has been taken away from him which he was entitled to under the lease, and that we ought to recall the interlocutor, and, as Lord Young has suggested, sustain the third plea in law for the respondent, with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the reasons of suspension and interdict: Sustain the third plea in law for the respondents: Therefore refuse the note of suspension and interdict, and decern."

Partnership—Constitution—Contract—Construction—Advance to firm—Share of Profits—Payment of prior debt out of profits—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 39), sec. 2, subsec. 3.—By minute of agreement which proceeded on the narrative that the first parties, Laing Brothers & Company, and the individual partners thereof, had applied to the second party, Low, "for an advance by way of loan to enable them the better to carry on their business," Low agreed to advance £1000 for three years (during which period the agreement was to continue), the first parties agreeing to pay interest at five per cent per annum. It was further agreed that the whole profits should remain in the business until the expiry of the agreement, when the £1000 was to be repaid and the profits equally divided between the parties, Low agreeing that his share should be applied by him in reduction pro tanto of a debt of £13,700 due to his father's estate by the individual partners and their father, to one-half of which Low was entitled.

The 5th article was as follows:—"The books of the said business shall be brought to a balance as on the 30th April and 31st October in each year, and should any of such balances shew that the capital, including loan in this account, has been reduced to £500, this agreement shall come to an end as at the date of said balance, and the amount then remaining shall be paid by the first parties to the second party, but under no circumstances shall the second party be liable for any sum beyond the £1000 he is to advance on loan." By the last article it was declared that Low should not be deemed in any respect a partner of the firm of Laing Brothers & Company.

The firm having been sequestrated, the trustee on its estate raised an action against Low, inter alia, to have it declared that he was a partner of Partnership—Bankruptcy—Title to sue—Sequestration of firm—Title of trustee to sue solvent partner for payment of debts due to firm's creditors.—Question whether the trustee on the estate of a firm which has been sequestrated has a title to sue a solvent partner for payment of the debts due by him as a partner to the creditors of the firm.

1st Division. Lord Low.

On 28th August 1891, Laing Brothers & Company, merchants and spinners in Dundee, and William R. Laing and David C. C. Laing, the individual partners, as such partners and as individuals, of the first part, entered into a minute of agreement with John Laing Low, of the second part, in the following terms:—"Whereas the first parties have applied to the second party for an advance by way of a loan to enable them the better to carry on their business: And whereas the second party has agreed to advance the sum of £1000 to be used by the first parties in their business upon the conditions hereinafter mentioned.

"(First) The second party hereby agrees to advance to the first parties the sum of £1000 in loan as above mentioned, and that for the period of three years from the 31st day of October 1891, upon which loan interest shall be paid by the first parties to the second party at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from the said 31st day of October 1891 to the term of payment, and that half-yearly. . . .

"(Second) The first parties agree that they shall retain in their business, and in order to secure the foresaid loan, the amount that may stand at their credit in the books of their firm as at 31st October 1891, at the expiry of a spinning account which will then come to an end, less the sum of £300 to be paid by them to Peter Matthew, merchant in Dundee.

"(Third) The whole profits made in the business during the foresaid period of three years during which the foresaid loan is to continue shall, under deduction of payments for management, wages, jute, and other ordinary and necessary outgoings requisite for carrying on the business, remain in the business, without any deduction other than that above specified until the expiry of this agreement, and on the expiry of the foresaid period the first parties shall repay in cash to the second party his said loan of £1000, and the whole of said profits shall be divided between the first parties and the second party equally.

"(Fourth) In estimating the profits of the said business the said first parties shall be entitled to charge against the said business" certain specified sums for rent, &c.

"(Fifth) The books of the said business shall be brought to a balance as on the 30th April and 31st October in each year, and should any of such balances shew that the capital, including loan in this account, has been reduced to £500, this agreement shall come to an end as at the date of said balance, and the amount then remaining shall be paid by the first parties to the second party, but under no circumstances shall the second party be liable for any sum beyond the £1000 he is to advance on loan.

"(Sixth) The second party hereby agrees to apply the share of the profits falling to him, as above mentioned, at the expiry of this agreement, in reduction or extinction of the debt secured by bonds and dispositions in security for £5700 and £8000, granted by the said John Laing and his sons, the said William Robert Laing, and David Colville Carruthers Laing, in favour of the late Andrew Beharie Low,

Esquire of Butterstone, the father of said second party, over the said Stobswell Works and machinery, and Dens Road factory and machinery, and the lands of Kellyfield and others, the half of the said debt to which he is entitled in the apportionment of the estate of his said father being reduced or extinguished primo loco.

"(Seventh) The said first parties shall have the sole power of buying and selling, and generally of conducting the said business, but they shall supply a monthly statement, shewing the quantity of jute in stock and to arrive, and the extent of orders for yarns to execute, to the said second party, and the said second party shall also be entitled to see the said half-yearly balance-sheets, declaring, however, that the first parties shall not be entitled to purchase or to have at any time in their possession a larger stock of jute than one or two months' supply in excess of yarns sold. . . .

"(Lastly) It is hereby declared, that notwithstanding the loan made in terms of this agreement by the second party, the said second party shall not be deemed or held to be in any respect a partner in the said firm of Laing Brothers & Company, and shall not be liable for the debts and obligations of that firm."

A receipt was indorsed upon the minute in the following terms:—"Dundee, 31st October 1891.—Received from the within named John L. Low, Esquire of Butterston, by the hands of Shiell & Small, solicitors, Dundee, the sum of £1000 sterling, falling to be paid to us, in terms of the foregoing minute of agreement. LAING BROS. & Co. W. R. LAING. DAVID C. C. LAING. £1000 stg."

On 9th March 1895 the estates of Laing Brothers & Company, as a company, and William R. Laing and David C. C. Laing as partners of the company, and as individuals, were sequestrated, and John Mess, accountant, Dundee, was appointed trustee on the several estates.

On 4th June 1895 Mr Mess raised the present action against John Laing Low, concluding for declarator that, in terms of the agreement of 28th August 1891, the defender was a partner of the firm of Laing Brothers & Company, and liable as such for the debts of the firm, and that the pursuer, as trustee, was entitled to recover from the defender such sums of money as might be necessary to pay the debts of the creditors of the firm after the estate of the firm had been exhausted. Decree was asked for payment of £25,000.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the said minute of agreement, the defender incurred the full liabilities of a partner of the firm of Laing Brothers & Company.

The defender stated, inter alia, that he was a nephew of William R. Laing and David C. C. Laing; that in making the advance in question he did not intend to enter, and did not enter, into any partnership with his uncles, and that he was at the time when the agreement was entered into, and for at least two years thereafter, an undergraduate at Cambridge with the intention of taking orders.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defender not being, and never having been, a partner of the firm of Laing Brothers & Company, is not liable for its obligations, and is entitled to absolvitor.

On 14th December 1895 the Lord Ordinary (Low) assoilzied the defender.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

The defender was thereafter allowed to amend his record by adding, inter alia, the plea "No title to sue."

The arguments of the parties on the construction of the agreement sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Court and of the Lord Ordinary. The parties referred to the Partnership Act, 1890, section 2,* and to the undernoted authorities.[1]

On the question of title to sue, the pursuer argued;—It had never been doubted that a trustee in the position of the pursuer was entitled to sue a partner. Speirs v. Dunlop[2] decided that he was. The opinions in Mann v. Sinclair[3] were to the same effect. It was admitted that the defender, if a partner, was liable to pay the creditors of the firm, and it was absurd to maintain that each several creditor would require to sue the defender.

The defender argued;—Assuming that the defender was a partner, the trustee had no title to sue. There was no question of the defender being liable still to contribute to the capital of the firm, or one by which a partnership was constituted; the defender, on the other hand, maintaining that it was an agreement fixing the terms upon which he agreed to lend £1000 to the firm for the purposes of their business.

"The agreement proceeds upon the narrative that the first parties (that is, the firm and the individual partners thereof) have applied to the second party for a loan 'to enable them the better to carry on their business,' and that the second party (the defender) has agreed to advance to them the sum of £1000, to be used in their business upon the conditions thereinafter mentioned.

"By the first article of the agreement the second party agreed to advance the sum of £1000 'in loan as above mentioned, and that for the period of three years from the 31st day of October 1891,' and the first parties bind themselves to pay interest 'upon the loan' at the rate of five per cent per annum.

"By the second article the first parties agree to retain in their business, of his being indebted to it directly on a trade account, and these were the only debts for which the pursuer might have had a title to sue.[1] The liability of a partner for the firm's debts only arose after the firm's estate was exhausted,[2] and was not an asset of the firm's estate and carried to the trustee under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 102. The defender being a solvent partner the creditors of the firm had an undoubted right each and all to sue him,[3] and if the pursuer was right he would thus be liable to double action. On the other hand, not being sequestrated, the defender could not claim a discharge from the trustee or from a majority of the creditors.[4] The trustee's title was no higher or wider than that of the bankrupt, except, perhaps, with regard to preferences, and he was allowed to sue a reduction of these in order to vindicate the bankrupt's estate. The proper way for the trustee to sue was to obtain an assignation from each creditor of his claim against the defender. That was the course followed in Dunlop v. Speirs.[5] In Mann v. Sinclair[6] the point was not decided, but the opinion of Lord Young favoured the present defender's contention.

'to secure the foresaid loan,' the amount that may stand at their credit in the books of the firm at a specified date, after deduction of a certain sum.

"So far the agreement is one in regard to a loan and nothing else, and the third article contains the first of the stipulations upon which the pursuer founds as shewing that a partnership was truly constituted, although under cover of an agreement bearing to be for a loan.

"The third article is to the following effect:—'The whole profits made in the business during the foresaid period of three years during which the foresaid loan is to continue shall, under deduction of payments for management,' and other payments of a like nature, 'remain in the business, without any deduction other than that above specified, until the expiry of this agreement, and on the expiry of the foresaid period the first party shall repay in cash to the second party his said loan of £1000, and the whole of said profits shall be divided between the first parties and the second party equally.'

"The pursuer, of course, founded upon the provision as to the division of profits, and argued that the fact that the defender was to be entitled to one-half of the profits was inconsistent with any other idea than that he was to be a partner, because it could not be said that he was to receive a share of the profits as interest upon the loan, interest having already been stipulated for by the first article. Now, no doubt, the receipt by a person of a share of profits is prima facie evidence that he is a partner, and if he was to receive a share of the profits in addition to interest at a full rate upon money lent by him to the firm the presumption of partnership might be very difficult to rebut.

"In this case, however, when the third article of the agreement is read along with the sixth article, it becomes clear that the defender was not to be entitled to a share of the profits in the ordinary sense of putting it into his pocket, but that the one-half of the profits which was apportioned to him by the third article was, under the sixth article, to be applied in a particular way.

"It appears that the defender's father had lent a large sum of money to LORD KINNEAR.—After the Lord Ordinary's decision in this case had been given the defender added a plea that the pursuer had no title to sue, but it does not appear to me that his position is materially altered by the new plea. If we were to consider the plea on the assumption that the defender was, in fact, a partner so as to render him liable jointly with the other partners, as well as severally, to the entire body of creditors of the bankrupt firm, I should not, as at present advised, be disposed to sustain it, but I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary, and for the reasons he has given, that the defender was not a partner of the bankrupt firm, and has incurred no liability to its creditors.

The law as now established may be stated in the words of Lord Justice Lindley:—"No person who does not hold himself out as a partner is liable to third persons for the acts of those whose profits he shares unless he and they are really partners inter se. At the same time persons may find that the firm, which was secured to the extent of £5700 over one property, and to the extent of £8000 over another property. The defender was under his father's settlement entitled to one-half of these debts.

"In these circumstances the defender agreed, in the sixth article of the agreement, to apply the share of the profits falling to him under the third article in extinction of the debts to which I have referred, 'the half of the said debt to which he is entitled in the apportionment of the estate of his said father being reduced or extinguished primo loco.'

"Apparently the parties did not contemplate that one-half of the profits for three years could possibly exceed the debts, because there is no provision for the disposal of any balance of profits remaining after payment of the debts.

"It seems to me that the arrangement set forth in article sixth entirely meets the argument which the pursuer founds upon article third. If in addition to interest at the rate of 5 per cent upon the £1000, the defender had been entitled to put one-half of the profits into his pocket, the argument would have been very difficult to resist, because the inference would have been that the consideration which the defender was to give for the share of the profits was the obligation of a partner for the liabilities of the firm. It is different, however, when, upon the face of the agreement, the consideration is a prior debt of the firm. I see nothing inconsistent with an agreement for the loan of money, that the lender should stipulate that during the period for which the loan was given part of the profits should be used as a sinking fund for the payment of a prior debt. If the business had been successful, and there had been accumulated profits at the end of the three years, the defender would not have received payment of the amount, but would simply have written off an equivalent portion of the debt.

"Returning now to the intervening articles of the agreement, I do not think that the fourth is of any importance, as it only provides that in estimating the profits certain sums shall be deducted in name of rent for the business premises, and a salary of £100 a year for an assistant. The fifth article, however, is the one upon which the pursuer's case chiefly depends. It provides that the books of the business shall be brought to a balance twice in each year, 'and should any such balances shew that the capital, including loan in this account, has been reduced to £500, this agreement shall come to an end as at the date of said balance, and the amount then remaining shall be paid by the first parties to the second party, but under they are partners for all purposes although they only intended to be so for purposes beneficial to themselves."

The question, therefore, is whether the defender and the bankrupts, Laing Brothers & Company, did or did not become partners inter se by virtue of the agreement on which the pursuer relies.

The agreement is in form an agreement for a loan, but it is said that it is in substance a contract of copartnery. In 1891, when the agreement was made, the bankrupts, William Laing and David Laing, were carrying on business under the name of Laing Brothers & Company, and the defender, who is their nephew, advanced to them a sum of £1000 for three years, on which they undertook to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. By the third article of the agreement it was stipulated that the whole profits made in the business during the foresaid period of three years should, under deduction of payments for management, and so on, remain in the business until the expiry of the agreement, and on the termination of the foresaid period the first parties, the borrowers, should repay to the no circumstances shall the second party be liable for any sum beyond the £1000 he is to advance on loan.'

"The pursuer contended that that article shewed that the parties recognised that the defender would be liable to creditors, and that the concluding words were an attempt to limit his liability to creditors, by an agreement between the partners. Further, just as the first article provided for the case of the business being successful, so the fifth article provided for the case of the business being unsuccessful. In the former case the defender was to be paid the £1000 in cash; in the latter case he was only to be paid the balance of capital of £500 or under which might remain. That stipulation, the pursuer contended, was entirely inconsistent with the idea that the defender was merely a lender to the firm, because no mere lender would agree, in the event of the firm to which he had lent money proving unsuccessful to give up his debt and content himself with any balance of capital to the amount of one-half of the loan or less which might remain.

"I am unable to assent to the pursuer's construction of the fifth article. I think that it is designed as a protection to the defender as a lender to the firm. By the previous part of the agreement, the £1000 which he lent was to become part of the capital of the firm and be used in the business, and there was to be no obligation to repay it until the lapse of three years. During that period the firm were entitled to trade with and risk the £1000, but if at any time it should appear that the firm had lost all their own capital, and one-half of the £1000 in addition, the defender was to be entitled at once to put an end to the agreement, and demand that the balance of capital still remaining should be handed over to him. There is no stipulation that the defender is to accept the balance of capital as in full payment of his debt, and I do not think that the obligation undertaken by the firm and the individual partners in the third article to repay the loan in cash would, in the event contemplated in the fifth article, be discharged or extinguished.

"The stipulation or declaration that the defender should in no circumstances be liable beyond the £1000 which he was to advance was, I think, unnecessary, and was, I imagine, inserted with the view of making it perfectly clear as between the parties to the contract, that although the defender took the risk of losing the £1000, or part of it, that was the limit of his risk and of his obligation. It is true that the article does not treat the defender simply as an ordinary creditor of the firm, because he is only to be entitled to claim the amount of capital brought out upon a balance of the books, that is to say, after the trade creditors are provided for. But lender his loan of £1000, and the whole of the profits should be equally divided between the parties. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that if this stipulation had stood alone it would have afforded a very formidable argument against the defender, but then it is qualified in a very material manner by the sixth article of the agreement, which restricts what had appeared under the third article to be an absolute right to share in the profits. For by the sixth article the lender agrees to apply the share of the profits falling to him at the expiry of the agreement in reduction or extinction of a certain debt secured by bonds and dispositions in security for £5700 and £8000, which were granted by the father of the borrowers, who was at one time in partnership with them, and by the borrowers themselves in favour of the father of the lender over the Stobswell Works and machinery, and certain other subjects belonging to them, the half of the said debt to which the lender was entitled being reduced or extinguished primo loco.

that is just the legal position of a lender to a firm who receives a share of the profits, under the third section of the Partnership Act of 1890. I am therefore of opinion that if the agreement, apart from the stipulation or declaration, does not make the defender a partner, the declaration does not do so.

"The seventh article of the agreement was also founded on by the pursuer as pointing to partnership rather than to the loan. It provides that the first parties shall have the sole power of buying and selling, and generally of conducting the business; and they shall supply a monthly statement to the defender of the amount of jute in stock, and the extent of the orders for yarn; and that the defender shall be entitled to see the half-yearly balance-sheets. It is then declared that the first parties shall not be entitled to have in stock a larger amount of jute than one or two months' supply in excess of yarns sold.

"No doubt these provisions might have been suitable enough for the case of a partner who was contributing capital, but who was taking no active part in the conduct of the business. They seem to me, however, to be equally suitable to the case of a lender who has advanced money necessary to enable the partners to carry on the business, and who, as a condition of the loan, has stipulated that the profits shall be accumulated for a certain period, and then applied in paying off a prior debt.

"The eighth and ninth articles do not touch the point at issue at all, but the last article declares that 'notwithstanding the loan made in terms of this agreement by the second party, the said second party shall not be deemed or held to be in any respect a partner in the said firm of Laing Brothers & Company, and shall not be liable for the debts and obligations of that firm.'

"I agree with the pursuer's counsel that that declaration would not prevent a partnership being constituted if the effect of a fair construction of the agreement otherwise was to shew that there was a partnership. But the declaration shews what the intention of the parties was—that they did not intend to make a partnership—and of course in the question of the construction of the agreement the intention of the parties to it is a matter of importance.

"For the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion that the agreement, upon a fair construction, is not one whereby a partnership was constituted, but one for fixing the conditions upon which the defender should lend £1000 to the firm. And that is sufficient for the decision of the case, because it is not said that the defender held himself out as a partner, or that any one gave the firm credit upon the faith of his being a partner.

"I shall therefore pronounce decree of absolvitor."

No. 208.

Laing Brothers & Co.'s Trustee v. Low.

The effect of these two articles taken together seems to me to be that the defender is not to receive a share of the profits as a partner, but that the share which by the third article is nominally appropriated to him, is in reality to be applied towards payment of a prior debt of the true partners in which he was himself a creditor to the extent of one-half. It is not a part only, as I read the contract, but the whole of the profits acquired by the defender that are to be applied in this manner; and the agreement is in substance that the defender undertakes to lend £1000 at interest, on condition that the borrower shall give further security for payment of debt already due to his father's representatives, of whom he was one, by retaining the profits of the business for three years, and at the end of that time applying or enabling him to apply one-half of these profits in reduction or extinction of the debt. One-half of the profits therefore is to go into the pockets of the borrowers—the true partners—and the other half in payment of their debt.

I do not think it necessary in considering the law applicable to such a contract as this to examine the number of previous cases in which the liability of a person lending money to a trading firm has been discussed, because the whole law on the subject has now been embodied in the Partnership Act. According to the provisions of that statute the receipt by a person of a share of the profits of a business is prima facie evidence that he is a partner, but it does not of itself make him a partner, and in particular it does not make him a partner that he receives payment of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments, or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business, or that he lends money to a person engaged in business on a contract that he should receive a share of the profits; and therefore in order to establish a partnership between the lender in this case and the borrowers, it is necessary that we should look for something more than that prima facie evidence of partnership which the statute says is not enough of itself to constitute that relation, something which indicates more clearly than participation in the profits, or which in conjunction with participation in profits clearly indicates, that the relation between the parties inter se was that of partnership, so that each was agent for the other in the conduct of a business for their joint benefit. Now, I am unable to find anything further in the contract than the clauses which I have already considered to indicate a relation of partnership. The pursuer urged very strongly upon our consideration the effect of the fifth clause, by which it is provided,—(Quoted supra, p. 1106).

It is said that that shews that the lender was to share the losses as well as the profits of the copartnery, and that there could be no stronger indication that the relation of partnership existed. Now, undoubtedly it is a note of partnership that a person who advances money to the firm is to risk his money in the business. But then the effect of this particular clause does not appear to me to put the lender in the position of sharing losses as a partner, but, on the contrary, to indicate a relation towards the borrowers entirely different from that of partnership. He had undertaken to advance money to remain in the hands of the firm for three years; but then he stipulates for a right to call it up if at any time it shall appear that the capital has been reduced to £500. It is said, I think quite correctly, that the stipulation that in that event the amount of the capital then remaining shall be paid by the borrowers to the lender, and that the lender shall be satisfied with such payment because the agreement has then come to an end, is not in accordance with the ordinary rights of a lender in a simple contract of loan, because the lender is to be entitled only to claim the amount of capital brought out by the balance of the books,—that is to say, after the creditors have been provided for. But then I think the Lord Ordinary's observation on that point is equally just, that under the third section of the Partnership Act that is the legal position of a lender to a trading firm who receives a share of profits. And therefore in so far as the stipulation in question gives the lender his money, or so much of it as may be extant only after the trade creditors have been satisfied, it is not a necessary inference that the relation between the parties was any other than that of lender and borrower. But then it is said he not only allows his right to be postponed to that of trade creditors, but that in the event provided for he consents to lose one half of his advance, and possibly more, because he is to be satisfied with what is left of the capital when the agreement comes to an end. Now, I agree that that is not generally the position of a creditor. The distinction between a creditor in an ordinary loan and a partner is undoubtedly that the creditor is indemnified against loss. But then neither is it the position of a partner. The stipulation is that the capital being to a large extent gone, the lender shall have paid over to himself in his own absolute right all that is left of it, and that he shall not be liable, under any circumstances, to pay anything more than the sum he had already advanced, with the right to what shall be left in the hands of the borrowers when the capital has been reduced. That is not the position of a partner, nor is it a liability for the losses of the firm. A partner's liability for losses arises from this, that he is answerable jointly with all the other partners, and also severally for all the debts of the firm, and therefore he must contribute his own proportion of the losses after the capital has been exhausted. The stipulation that the lender shall be under no liability to make such contributions is the negation of an elementary condition of partnership, and therefore I do not find in this stipulation any more than in that for the application of profits any indication that the parties were partners inter se.

I do not quite agree with the Lord Ordinary in an observation which he makes, that the condition that the second party should in no circumstances be liable for anything more than the sum advanced is superfluous. It may be that it might have been inferred, even if it had not been expressed in words. But I think the expression is material as shewing the true intention of the contract. For, since participation in profits is prima facie evidence to instruct partnership, every term of the contract must be of importance which goes to confirm or to displace that conclusion. From this point of view the remaining clauses, except the last, do not appear to me to be of much significance. But the last is very material, because it negatives the relation of partnership in express terms. It declares that the second party shall not be deemed or held to be in any respect a partner in the said firm, and shall not be liable for the debts and obligations of that firm. Now, if the law is, as I apprehend it to be, that the liability which the pursuer seeks to enforce against the defender depends upon his establishing that there was a contract of copartnery between him and the borrowers, making them partners inter se, this stipulation appears to me conclusive. If sharing of profits is not enough, then what is further required in order to constitute partnership must be something which shews that the parties were agents for each other in carrying on business, and were entitled to bind each other by contracts for the common benefit, and that cannot, in my opinion, be maintained on a fair construction of this contract. On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is important in a case of this description to distinguish clearly between the question of partnership and the somewhat allied question of representation. While it is true that a man may be subject to the liabilities of a partner without actually being one, if he holds himself out, or suffers himself to be held out, as a partner, the benefit resulting from that liability is always confined to the persons who have been deceived by the representation. The principle is very clearly recognised in the 14th section of the Partnership Act of 1890.

Now, this is not an action for the purpose of rendering Mr Low liable as a partner on the ground that he held himself out, or allowed himself to be held out, as a partner of the bankrupt firm. The ground of liability alleged is that by contract he is a partner with other two gentlemen whose estates, as well as those of the firm, have been sequestrated.

The question, whether the defender has entered into the contract of partnership, must be determined on similar principles to those which govern the construction of other contracts; that is to say, we must endeavour to find out what is the true meaning of the agreement upon which the trustee founds his action. Now, within a period which some of us remember, some of the conditions of this agreement would most probably have been held to amount to a partnership, but since the passing of Lord Justice Bovill's Act (1865), the provisions of which are in substance included in the Partnership Act, 1890, it has been established law that the receipt of a share of profits as remuneration for services, or in place of interest on a loan, does not of itself constitute the relation of partnership. That is now provided in the 3d subsection of sec. 2 of the Partnership Act of 1890, and amongst other examples which are given of the cases in which the receipt of profits will not make a man a partner, the first is, "the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquid amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business."

Now, the two chief notes of partnership under this agreement are (1) that the annual return for the sum of £1000 lent by Mr Low is given in the shape of interest and a share of the profits; and (2) that the surplus profits are divided between the first parties and the second party, under the condition that the share coming to Mr Low is to be applied in repayment of an old debt. These two conditions are therefore such as are declared by Act of Parliament not in themselves to constitute partnership, and when we come to inquire what other conditions there are, which, taken along with these, will amount to partnership, I can find none. One of the points insisted on by counsel is that the parties had been at pains to state in very clear terms, and in more than one of the articles of the agreement, that Mr Low was not to be responsible for losses, or to incur any other liability than the loss of his £1000. I think the argument to which I have referred rests upon what seems to me to be a confusion of ideas in applying to the construction of a contract a principle which is often applied quite legitimately to the consideration of evidence. If a witness is continually protesting that he has not committed himself to something, that is an element which may lead to the suspicion that he has done it, and is anxious to get out of it. But when the question is not one of evidence, but of the construction of a written document, why should the statement of the parties that they do not intend to subject one of their number to the liabilities of a partner not have the same effect accorded to it as any other statement in the deed, the question always being, what is the meaning of the words used to express their intention?

The pursuer's counsel also made a point on the 5th article, which they say involves the unnecessary surrender of a contract right if Mr Low is not a partner. I agree with Lord Kinnear in his observations on this article, as well as in all the rest of his Lordship's judgment, and I shall say nothing more on this head except this, that I think nothing could be more reasonable on the part of a person lending his money as a friendly loan, seeing that he is debarred from all control of the business, than that he should stipulate that after a suitable interval the books should be examined, and he should be allowed to do what he can to get something out of the assets of the estate. I fail to see that there is in this article the slightest indication of intention to constitute partnership, though there are expressions which are perhaps open to criticism.

Being clearly of opinion that Mr Low is not a partner under the agreement, it is not necessary for me to enter into the question of the trustee's title. But I may say that, if that point were gone into, I think the trustee would find difficulty in establishing a title to call on anyone outside the trust to contribute towards the fund for distribution. Where a deed of partnership provides for further contributions the trustee no doubt has the right to enforce the obligation. But there is no obligation under this agreement to contribute anything beyond the original sum of £1000. Mr Low's estates have not been sequestrated; he is assumed to be solvent, and so there is neither a relation of contract nor a proprietary interest so far as I can see, on which the trustee can base his title. In the clause of the Partnership Act constituting the special law of Scotland on this subject all that is said is that the firm is a separate person in law, but that a partner is liable to be charged to meet the obligations of the firm. Now, sequestration is not a process for rendering a party liable to meet the obligations of a firm—it is a process for attaching the assets of those who are members of the firm, and who have been made bankrupt, and I am unable to see how this sequestration is to be converted into an active title for the purpose of putting persons under the trust who are not named in the trustee's appointment.

Expenses—Taxation—Expenses between agent and client, or between party and party—Process—Interlocutor—Trust.—In an action by a sole testamentary trustee for his discharge, to which defences were lodged, the Court pronounced an interlocutor decerning for the balance due to him on an accounting, finding him entitled to "expenses," appointing him to denude of the trust-estate on receiving payment of said balance and of his expenses, and thereafter discharging him.

The Auditor taxed the pursuer's account of expenses as between party and party. The pursuer objected to the Auditor's report, on the ground that the account should have been taxed as between agent and client. The defenders pleaded that the objection came too late.

Held that the intention of the Court in finding the pursuer entitled to expenses was that he should be kept indemnis in respect he was denuding of the whole trust-estate, and therefore that the account fell to be taxed as between agent and client.

2D DIVISION. Lord Low.

DAVID STEWART, solicitor, Dundee, sole surviving trustee acting under a mutual trust-disposition and settlement, granted by John Davidson, formerly mason in Lochee, and his wife, brought an action against Isabella Stewart or Simmons, Lochee, and her husband as her administrator-in-law and as guardian of his pupil children, concluding for declarator that the pursuer and his co-trustees, now deceased, had fully accounted for his and their whole intromissions, and for a discharge for himself and his co-trustees upon his granting a valid and sufficient conveyance of certain heritable property in favour of the defenders for their respective rights of fee and liferent.

Mrs Simmons and her husband lodged defences, raising certain questions of accounting between the parties.

On these questions the parties were, in the Outer-House, each found to be in part in the right, the result being brought out in the following interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary (Low), pronounced on 19th March 1896:—"Having considered the cause, decerns against the defender Mrs Simmons for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £6, 4s., being the balance brought out as due by her" in an accountant's report, "and on said sum being paid, appoints the clerk of the process to deliver up to Mrs Simmons the disposition No. of process, executed by the pursuer in conformity with the interlocutor of 4th February last, and on said delivery being made, discharges the pursuer of the office of trustee referred to on record, and also exoners and discharges the pursuer and his co-trustees conform to the conclusions of the summons thereanent: And after hearing counsel on the question of expenses, finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, subject to modification to the extent of one-half of the taxed amount thereof: Allows an account," &c.

The pursuer reclaimed against this interlocutor, but at the hearing intimated that he acquiesced in the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the questions of accounting and in the finding as to expenses, and explained that the purpose of the reclaiming note was to have it made a condition of the disposition being delivered to the defenders that the expenses should first be paid to the pursuer, the Lord Ordinary having refused a motion to that effect.

The defenders stated that they did not object to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in any respect.

On 5th June the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern against the defender Mrs Simmons for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £6, 4s. sterling . . . Further, find the pursuer entitled to expenses in the Outer-House, subject to modification to the extent of one-half of the taxed amount thereof, as also to the whole expenses of his reclaiming note, and on said sum of £6, 4s. sterling and the said expenses being paid to the pursuer, appoint the clerk of the process to deliver to Mrs Simmons the disposition No. of process, duly executed, and thereafter discharge the pursuer and his co-trustees in terms of the conclusions of the action, and decern: Remit the said accounts of expenses to the Auditor to tax and to report."

The Auditor taxed the pursuer's accounts of expenses as between party and party, but also reported that £183, 10s. 5½d. would be the total amount of one-half the Outer-House expenses and the whole of the Inner-House expenses, both taxed as between agent and client.

The pursuer lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report, maintaining that his accounts (both Outer and Inner-House) should be taxed as between agent and client.

Argued for the pursuer;—The presumption was that a trustee who was not in breach of duty was to be kept indemnis, which the pursuer here would not be if he were held entitled only to expenses as between party and party. In most cases it would be a matter of no practical moment to a trustee which scale of taxation was adopted, for the trustee had the trust-estate to fall back on for his indemnity. Here, however, the pursuer had not that relief, for on payment of the expenses found due to him he had to denude of the whole trust-estate. It was nothing to the present point that the pursuer was found entitled to one-half only of his Outer-House expenses. The pursuer might have been wrong in acquiescing in the Lord Ordinary's judgment on that matter, but he had acquiesced, so that the Court's affirmance of the Lord Ordinary's finding as to expenses was merely formal. Nor was there any technical objection to the pursuer's contention. The Court were entitled to construe their finding as to expenses.[1] Fletcher's Trustees,[2] founded on by the defenders, did not establish any rule to the contrary. All that the Court there decided was that they did not intend by their finding as to expenses to give expenses as between agent and client. The reason was obvious. The action was a multiplepoinding in which all parties were found entitled to expenses out of the fund in medio. That in the case of the unsuccessful parties plainly meant expenses as between party and party; and the finding as to expenses could not receive a different construction in the case of the other parties.

Argued for the defenders;—It was too late to raise this question now. A finding as to expenses without qualification meant expenses as between party and party, and such an interlocutor could not be qualified after it had been pronounced.[2] The reason was that the question of expenses ought to be settled when the Court had the merits of the action before them. In any event, this was not a case for expenses as between agent and client. The Lord Ordinary's finding that the pursuer was entitled to half only of the expenses, which finding the pursuer had not questioned, displaced any presumption that there might be in favour of a trustee being kept indemnis.

LORD MONCREIFF.—It would have been better if this question had been decided when expenses were awarded. But our intention was that the trustee should be kept indemnis, and this could not be done if he only gets expenses as between party and party, as he is bound to denude of the whole trust-estate on payment of expenses.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel on the note of objections by the pursuer to the Auditor's report on his account of expenses, sustain the same: Find that the proper taxed amount thereof is £183, 10s. 5½d., and subject to this alteration approve of said report and decern," &c.

2D DIVISION. Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow.

IN April 1893 John Raeside, proprietor of certain subjects which were bounded on the south by Onslow Drive, Dennistoun, Glasgow, and on the west by Meadow Park Street, presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow, for authority to erect seven tenements of buildings on these subjects, conform to plans produced.

The Master of Works for the city objected to Nos. 1 and 2 of the proposed tenements on the ground that the back windows of these tenements did not comply with the requirements of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, and the Glasgow Buildings Regulations Act, 1892, with respect to free space.*

From the plans produced, it appeared that tenement No. 1 wholly faced Meadow Park Street, and its back wall was wholly parallel with that street. No. 2 partly faced Meadow Park Street and partly faced Onslow Drive, but its back wall was wholly parallel with Onslow Drive. The back walls of the two tenements thus formed a right angle.

Section 372 provides,—"The said provisions shall not apply to the following cases, viz., to any apartment in a building at the corner of a turnpike road or public street and of a private street, or at the corner of a turnpike road or public street and of another public street, provided such apartment is wholly above the level of the said road and street, and provided the building in which it is situated does not extend along the narrowest of them for a greater distance than 50 feet. . . . ."

The Master of Works in his objections stated:—"In the plans lodged in Court the same free space is treated as available for sleeping apartments in both of said tenements, the windows of which are not in the same plane, and these windows overlook a court or area and not a public or private street. Further, the said buildings do not fall under the exception" in "section 33, because there is not left at the gable of the corner tenement a through space or opening from the street to the back ground 10 feet wide, and open from the height of 15 feet upwards. In these particulars the objector submits that the proposed buildings are not in accordance with the requirements of the Acts before mentioned. With regard to the petitioner's statement that the buildings to be erected by him are within the excepted cases mentioned in section 372 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the objector maintains that that section must be read in conjunction with section 33 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1892. The free space in section 370 of the 1866 Act is defined in said section 33 of the Building Regulations Act, and said definition controls the provisions of said section 370 of the 1866 Act and the subsequent sections thereof, viz., sections 371 and 372. . . . In section 33 of the Building Regulations Act there is a provision that the free space as defined by that section shall not apply to the back windows in a tenement forming the corner of two streets, provided there is left at one gable of each such corner tenement the through space or opening mentioned in the objections—that exception being applicable to the same class of buildings as are specified in section 372 of the 1866 Act. It is therefore clear that the free space, as defined by said section 33 of the Building Regulations Act, 1892, supersedes the free space defined in section 370 of the 1866 Act, and supersedes the exception in section 372 thereof."

The petitioner admitted that he did not propose to leave at the gable of tenement No. 2 a through space or opening from the street to the back 10 feet wide, and open from the height of 15 feet upwards; but he maintained that tenement No. 2 being a corner tenement and so exempt under section 372 of the Act of 1866 from the provisions regarding free space was not affected by section 33 of the Act of 1892, which merely defined the character of the free space requisite in the case of buildings which under the principal Act were required to have free space, but did not enact that buildings which had previously been exempt should for the future comply with the provisions regarding free space. As therefore tenement No. 2 did not, quoad the statutes, require to have any free space, the whole free space at the back of the two tenements was available in the sense of the statutes for tenement No. 1, and that free space being sufficient for tenement No. 1 per se, a passage between the two tenements was not necessary.

On 26th May 1893 the Dean of Guild pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the objections stated by the Master of Works to the plans produced, in so far as the same do not shew, in the tenement at the corner of Onslow Drive and Meadow Park Street, a through space or opening from the street to the back ground 10 feet wide, and open from the height of 15 feet upwards, as required by section 33 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1892: Finds that the said provision is something in addition to, and over and above, the provisions as to free space in sections 370 and 371 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, and that the exception to the said last mentioned provisions in section 372 thereof does not and cannot be held to apply to the said additional provision in section 33 of the Act of 1892, which must be complied with by the petitioner: Allows the petitioner to amend his plans to make them conform to the foresaid provision in section 33 of the Act of 1892."

The Dean of Guild having subsequently granted leave to appeal the petitioner appealed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The appellant here desires to get a lining from the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow, and the question which has arisen relates to certain windows in the corner of the back part of the tenement he proposes to build. Now, if section 370 applies to the appellant directly, of course there would be an end of the case. He must conform to section 370 if it applies. The first question therefore is, whether that section applies to his tenement? By section 372 certain exceptions are made to the application of section 370, and it is conceded that if these exceptions, and in particular the first exception, are in full operation and unmodified, then the provisions of section 370 do not apply to the appellant's tenement. Now, section 370 prescribes that there shall be a certain air space "equal to at least three-fourths of the height of the wall in which it is placed, measuring such space in a straight line from and at right angles to the plane of the window, and measuring such wall from the floor of the apartment to where the roof of the building rests upon such wall." But the first exception to the application of that rule is, that it shall not apply to "any apartment in a building at the corner of a turnpike road or public street and of a private street, or at the corner of a turnpike road or public street and of another public street, provided such apartment is wholly above the level of the said road and street, and provided the building in which it is situated does not extend along the narrowest of them for a greater distance than 50 feet."

Now, it is not matter of dispute between the parties that every word of that applies to the present case, and therefore if this had been a case arising solely under the Act of 1866, the Dean of Guild would have been bound to grant a lining. But then the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1892 was passed, and section 33 deals with section 370 by way of defining what is the meaning of free space in the Act of 1866, and the respondent contends that the building which the appellant proposes to erect offends against that definition; but if that definition is such that the building could not be erected under section 370 as qualified by section 33 of the Act of 1892, it would make no difference, because clause 372 would still remain, and the first paragraph of it would apply to except the appellant's tenement. But after defining the meaning of free space in the Act of 1866, section 33 further provides that that shall still not apply to certain specified cases, and Mr Craigie maintains that these provisions for the purpose of limiting the application of the definition given in the commencement of the section have the effect of repealing the exemption contained in section 372. Now, I think that if the Act of 1866, standing by itself, places the appellant in this position—that clause 372 does apply to him, it is impossible to find anything—I can find nothing—in clause 33 of the Glasgow Buildings Act of 1892 which shall deprive him of the benefit of the exception provided for by the Act of 1866. I do not see that the proviso on which Mr Craigie relies has any relation whatever to clause 372. The Act of 1866 must be looked at by itself, and if the case in question is found to be under the clause 372, we have no need to look to what is the provision or the proper interpretation of these provisions in section 370 at all, or whether anything is added to them by the Act of 1892. Holding as I do, without the slightest doubt, that between 1866 and 1892 the Dean of Guild would have been bound to give this appellant a lining under his present application, I hold that the position of the Dean of Guild in the matter is not the least affected by clause 33 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1892, and that it does not in any way affect the appellant's rights under the first proviso of clause 372, and that therefore the judgment ought to be recalled and the Dean of Guild ordered to give a lining.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think it plain that the buildings which the appellant proposes to erect fall under clause 372 of the Act of 1866. Therefore it is equally plain that they are not affected by provisions in the 370th section of the Statute of 1866. The only question that remains is, whether the 372d clause has been repealed or affected by the 33d clause of the Act of 1892. I am clear that it has not. That clause is a clause of definition only, defining the free space mentioned in the 370th section of the Act of 1866, and making some exceptions from that definition.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think the buildings of the appellant fall within the description given in section 372 of the Act of 1866, and it is obvious that if that is so the petitioner is entitled to his lining, unless the Dean of Guild is right in saying that section 33 of the Act of 1892 introduces a new provision in addition to and over and above the provisions as to free space contained in the Act of 1866. That is a reading of the Act of 1892 which I think is absolutely untenable, and as it is the only ground of the Dean of Guild's judgment, I agree with your Lordship that the judgment ought to be reversed.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT, on 13th June 1893, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the buildings objected to fall within the exception contained in section 372 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866: Find that the provisions of sections 370 and 371 of said Act, and the provisions of section 33 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1892, do not apply to said buildings: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor appealed against: Remit to the Dean of Guild to grant the lining craved by the petitioner, and decern: Find the petitioner entitled to the expenses of the appeal, and the expenses incurred by him in the Dean of Guild Court, in so far as these were caused by the opposition to the prayer of the petition," &c.

Factor's right of retention—Right in Security—Effect of assignation to rents in bond and disposition in security.

4. Held that factors who had been authorised by their principal to collect and retain rents in repayment of advances made by them to him were entitled to retain the rents in competition with creditors who held bonds over the property duly recorded, and containing assignations to rents in ordinary form, but who had not brought an action of maills and duties against the tenants. Factor's right of retention—Right in Security—Retrocession of bankrupt.

5. A, the proprietor of heritage, appointed a firm of house factors to be factors of his property, and authorised them to retain the rents which they collected in repayment of an advance which they had made to him on his acceptance. Subsequently a petition for sequestration of A's estates was presented three days before the term of Martinmas, and the first deliverance was pronounced on the same day. At Martinmas the factors uplifted the rents and retained them in repayment of their advance. The trustee who was appointed on A's sequestrated estates made no objection to the retention of the rents by the factors, and they lodged no claim in the sequestration. A having thereafter been discharged on a composition, and retrocessed in his estates, claimed the rents retained by the factors on the ground that it was property falling under the sequestration which belonged to him in virtue of his retrocession. Held that the factors were entitled to retain the rents claimed. ARBITRATION. Reference of differences with respect to matters referred to in a section of private Act—Jurisdiction—Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, sec. 6.

1. By the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, sec. 6, subsec. (4), it was enacted that a railway company should carry their line under certain ground belonging to the North British Railway Company in tunnel, and that in the construction of the tunnel the company should not "without the previous consent of" the North British Company break open the surface of the ground. By subsec. (7) it was enacted that bridges and works passing over or under lands belonging to the North British Company should be according to plans approved of by the engineer of that company. By subsec. (10) it is enacted that "if any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade. . . ." The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground belonging to the North British Company. The questions raised in the action were whether certain plans which had been submitted by the company to and approved of by the engineer of the North British Company disclosed the ventilating shaft, and if they did, whether the engineer's approval was equivalent to the consent required by subsec. (4), or otherwise barred the North British Company from challenging the shaft. The defenders pleaded the reference clause. The pursuers maintained that the questions did not constitute a difference in the sense of subsec. (10), in respect (1) that the erection of the shaft was altogether outwith the statutory powers of the defenders; and (2) that the questions were essentially questions of law. Held that a difference had arisen which fell to be referred in terms of subsec. (10). North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., Nov. 5, 1895, p. 76.

The arbiter in his award found "that the proviso of section* 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865 . . . does not apply to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Act, 1884, between the two companies at Elgin," and further, "that the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively, in accordance with their respective mileage, and under the rules of the Clearing House." In an action raised by the Great North of Scotland Railway Company for implement of the award, the defenders made and asked to be allowed a proof of the following averment:—"The terms 'traffic exchanged under the Act of 1884 between the two companies at Elgin,' occurring in the question submitted to A B do not include, and were not intended to include, passenger traffic. This was explained to A B, and he and both the parties acted in the whole proceedings before him on the footing that no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts was submitted to him, and he accordingly decided no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts." Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the award was unambiguous, and must receive effect. Highland Railway Co. v. Subsequently, on the motion of the pursuers, the names of four of the pursuers were deleted from the summons, together with the conclusions applicable to them respectively. The remaining pursuer afterwards obtained a decree. Held (1) that the original summons was incompetent; and (2) that the alteration on the summons was an amendment in the sense of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, and did not validate the arrestments so as to confer a preference on the remaining pursuer in competition with other creditors of the defender at the date of the arrestment. In 1869 a silver cup was presented to the curling clubs of Dumfriesshire for competition as a trophy, and these clubs (which were not incorporated societies) framed rules, under which the cup was to become the property of the club which won the cup twice in succession. In 1893 the cup was so won by the Upper Annandale Club. Thereafter, at a meeting of that club, it was resolved, by a majority of the members present, to present the cup to M. J., who had been skip of the rink which obtained the highest score on the two successive occasions on which the club had won the cup. In an action brought against M. J. by certain members of the club, who had objected to the presentation, held that the club not being an incorporated society the cup was the joint property of all the individual members of the club; that it was ultra vires of a majority of the members thus to give away the joint property against the wishes of the minority; and therefore that the presentation to M. BILL OF EXCHANGE. Value—Promissory-notes granted for one day's delay in exacting payment of debt.

1. On 5th June 1895 a money-lender lent a lady £104, in return for two promissory-notes for £100 and £24, 16s. respectively, payable on demand. On 3d July 1895, the borrower being called on to pay, and being unable to do so, the lender induced her in consideration of twenty-four hours' delay, to grant him three additional promissory-notes payable on demand, for a further sum of £250. On 23d July the lender registered protests for non-payment of the five notes, and charged for payment of £200, the amount of two of the notes. In a suspension of the charge, in which the above facts were admitted, the suspender tendered payment of the first two promissory-notes for £124,

In respect of this tender, and of the fact that no value had been given for the three promissory-notes for £250, the Court suspended the charge, and found the respondent liable in the whole expenses of the cause, and directed the Clerk of Court to deliver to the complainer the five promissory-notes. Proof—Parole—Competency—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 100.

2. In defence to an action for the amount due under a promissory-note, the debtor stated that, under an arrangement between him and the creditor, the promissory-note was to be renewed when due, and from time to time thereafter until he should be in a position to repay it without detriment to his business engagements, and that he had been assured by the creditor that the date of repayment would be left to himself so long as interest was paid. The Court held that the defender was not entitled to a proof of his averment, on the ground that if the agreement meant that the defender was not bound to pay the principal sum, but an annuity, it contradicted the written obligation; and that if the agreement meant a promise by the creditor not to press for payment, the agreement not being in writing, it was not binding on his executors.

Opinion reserved whether it would be open to an obligant to prove a verbal agreement that a bill should be renewable for a definite time, or that the debt should subsist for a definite time, the bill being treated as a mere security for its ultimate payment. The protest bore that the notary "presented the said bill at the place where payable to a clerk there, who made answer that no funds had been provided to meet said bill, and payment was refused accordingly." Held that the drawer could not be regarded as agent of the acceptor for payment to himself, and therefore that the protest was invalid, as it failed to state that the acceptor could not be found. Bartsch v. Poole & Co., Dec. 18, 1895, p. 328.

Protest for non-payment—Demand for payment.

4. Held by Lord Kincairney that an extract registered protest was not invalid because it did not state expressly that a demand for payment had been made, but merely stated that the bill had been presented and that payment had been refused. Bartsch v. Poole & Co., Dec. 18, 1895, p. 328.

Protest for non-payment—Demand for payment when sum already paid to account.

5. Held by Lord Kincairney that an extract registered protest which set forth that a bill had been presented, and that payment had been refused, and that the notary protested the bill against the acceptor, but always under deduction of a sum paid to account, was not invalid because it did not state that the demand on presentation was limited to the balance due on the bill. Sequestration—Right of trustee to delivery of bankrupt's books and papers—Public-house Certificate.

2. Held that the trustee upon the sequestrated estate of a publican was prima facie entitled to get delivery from the bankrupt of his permit-book and certificate. Fraser's Trustee v. Fraser, July 8, 1896, p. 978.

Sequestration—Preference—Poinding of the ground—Ground-annual—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 118.

3. Held that the creditor under a contract of ground-annual is entitled to the benefit of the proviso in sec. 118 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, the annual payments under the contract being truly the interest on a debt of which the principal is the capitalised value of the annual payments. Bell's Trustees v. Copeland & Co., March 13, 1896, p. 650.

Sequestration—Retrocession of Bankrupt—Right in Security—Factor's right of retention.

4. A, the proprietor of heritage, appointed a firm of house factors to be factors of his property, and authorised them to retain the rents which they collected in repayment of an advance which they had made to him on his acceptance. Subsequently a petition for sequestration of A's estates was presented three days before the term of Martinmas, and the first deliverance was pronounced on the same day. At Martinmas the factors uplifted the rents and retained them in repayment of their advance. The trustee who was appointed on A's sequestrated estates made no objection to the retention of the rents by the factors, and they lodged no claim in the sequestration. A having thereafter been discharged on a composition, and retrocessed in his estates, claimed the rents retained by the factors on the ground that it was property falling under the sequestration which belonged to him in virtue of his retrocession. Held that the factors were entitled to retain the rents claimed. Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist v. Dawson, Feb. 5, 1896, p. 496.

Sequestration—Abandonment of action—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 10.

5. The trustee in a sequestration, who had sisted himself as pursuer, and carried on an action raised by the bankrupt prior to sequestration, lodged a minute craving leave to abandon the action. The minuter did not found on the Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 10, and did not propose to pay the defenders' expenses. The Court refused the minute. Scott v. Thurso River Harbour Trustees, Dec. 11, 1895, p. 268.

Sequestration of firm—Title of trustee to sue solvent partner for payment of debts due to firm's creditors.

6. Question, whether the trustee on the estate of a firm which has been sequestrated has a title to sue a solvent partner for payment of debts due by him as a partner to the creditors of the firm. Laing Brothers & Co.'s Trustee v. Low, July 17, 1896, p. 1105.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Value—Promissory-notes granted for one day's delay in exacting payment of debt.

1. On 5th June 1895 a money-lender lent a lady £104, in return for two promissory-notes for £100 and £24, 16s. respectively, payable on demand. On 3d July 1895, the borrower being called on to pay, and being unable to do so, the lender induced her in consideration of twenty-four hours' delay, to grant him three additional promissory-notes payable on demand, for a further sum of £250. On 23d July the lender registered protests for non-payment of the five notes, and charged for payment of £200, the amount of two of the notes. In a suspension of the charge, in which the above facts were admitted, the suspender tendered payment of the first two promissory-notes for £124,

16s. In respect of this tender, and of the fact that no value had been given for the three promissory-notes for £250, the Court suspended the charge, and found the respondent liable in the whole expenses of the cause, and directed the Clerk of Court to deliver to the complainer the five promissory-notes. Young v. Gordon, Jan. 23, 1896, p. 419.

Proof—Parole—Competency—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 100.

2. In defence to an action for the amount due under a promissory-note, the debtor stated that, under an arrangement between him and the creditor, the promissory-note was to be renewed when due, and from time to time thereafter until he should be in a position to repay it without detriment to his business engagements, and that he had been assured by the creditor that the date of repayment would be left to himself so long as interest was paid. The Court held that the defender was not entitled to a proof of his averment, on the ground that if the agreement meant that the defender was not bound to pay the principal sum, but an annuity, it contradicted the written obligation; and that if the agreement meant a promise by the creditor not to press for payment, the agreement not being in writing, it was not binding on his executors.

Opinion reserved whether it would be open to an obligant to prove a verbal agreement that a bill should be renewable for a definite time, or that the debt should subsist for a definite time, the bill being treated as a mere security for its ultimate payment. Gibson's Trustees v. Galloway, Jan. 22, 1896, p. 414.

Protest for non-payment—Bill payable at drawer's office—Form of protest where acceptor fails to appear or provide funds—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 51, subsec. (7).

3. A bill payable on demand at the drawer's office was protested for non-payment. The protest bore that the notary "presented the said bill at the place where payable to a clerk there, who made answer that no funds had been provided to meet said bill, and payment was refused accordingly." Held that the drawer could not be regarded as agent of the acceptor for payment to himself, and therefore that the protest was invalid, as it failed to state that the acceptor could not be found. Bartsch v. Poole & Co., Dec. 18, 1895, p. 328.

Protest for non-payment—Demand for payment.

4. Held by Lord Kincairney that an extract registered protest was not invalid because it did not state expressly that a demand for payment had been made, but merely stated that the bill had been presented and that payment had been refused. Bartsch v. Poole & Co., Dec. 18, 1895, p. 328.

Protest for non-payment—Demand for payment when sum already paid to account.

5. Held by Lord Kincairney that an extract registered protest which set forth that a bill had been presented, and that payment had been refused, and that the notary protested the bill against the acceptor, but always under deduction of a sum paid to account, was not invalid because it did not state that the demand on presentation was limited to the balance due on the bill. Bartsch v. Poole & Co., Dec. 18, 1895, p. 328.

BONA ET MALA FIDES. Lease—Landlord and Tenant—Lease by bona fide possessor without title—Assignation.

The title of a bona fide possessor of land, who had granted a lease of minerals for twelve years, was reduced when 3½ years of the lease had still to run. He then granted an assignation of the lease in favour of the true owner, who undertook to implement the granter's obligations. In an action by the lessee against the granter and the assignee for declarator that the pursuer was not bound by the lease, held that the lease was not binding on the true owner when he established his right to the lands, and therefore that it was not binding on the tenant, and that the assignation had no effect, as the granter had nothing to assign, diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion (1) that as the lease had been granted by a bona fide possessor in the course of ordinary administration, it was binding upon the true owner, and (2) that if the lease was not binding upon him originally he was entitled to validate it by homologation, and had done so. Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees, March 13, 1896, p. 636.

BURGH. Royal Burgh—Common Good—Petty Customs—Liability to petty customs of area added by statute to royal burgh—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 13.

1. A royal burgh, the magistrates of which under its charter, dated in 1600, had power to levy petty customs within the area of the burgh as described in the charter, was extended in terms of the General Police Act, 1862. Held that the magistrates had no power to levy petty customs in the portions of the burgh which were outside the ancient royalty. Graham v. Magistrates of Perth, March 12, 1896, p. 602.

Royal Burgh—Common Good—Causeway-mail—Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, secs. 3 and 33.

2. Held that dues levied under the charter of a royal burgh on cattle, horses, &c., passing through the ancient royalty to and from markets within portions of the burgh added under the powers of the General Police Act, 1862, were within the definition of causeway-mail in section 3 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, and were therefore illegal under section 33 of that Act. Graham v. Magistrates of Perth, March 12, 1896, p. 602.

Dean of Guild—Right to refuse petition ex proprio motu—Ultra vires.

3. The Corporation of Edinburgh presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court of Leith for warrant to erect a hospital within the burgh of Leith. The petition was served upon the Leith Local Authority, who entered appearance, but stated no objections. The Dean of Guild refused the petition in hoc statu on the ground that the petitioners had no right to erect a hospital within the burgh of Leith without the consent of the Local Authority. In an appeal held that the Dean of Guild was not entitled to give effect to the objection ex proprio motu. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Beatson, Oct. 29, 1895, p. 44.

Dean of Guild—Process—Form of warrant when buildings erected before warrant granted.

4. Held that a warrant by a Dean of Guild granting leave to erect a building which had in fact been erected before the warrant was applied for, though inaccurate and inappropriate, was not invalid.

Observations as to the form which a warrant in such circumstances should take. Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees, Oct. 18, 1895, p. 13.

Dean of Guild—Process—Answers lodged for first time on appeal—Competency.

5. In a petition to the Dean of Guild for warrant to alter a building the Burgh Engineer appeared on behalf of the Lord Provost and Magistrates, who were called as respondents, and objected verbally to the petition being granted. The Dean of Guild having refused the petition, the petitioners appealed, and thereafter answers were tendered for the Lord Provost and Magistrates, embodying the verbal objections previously stated on their behalf. The petitioners objected to the answers being received. The Court allowed the answers to be received, and remitted the case to the Dean of Guild to proceed. Lord Saltoun v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 3, 1896, p. 956.

6. The owner of premises within a burgh having applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect a flue inside the subjects belonging to him—the title to which he produced—an adjoining proprietor objected that the proposed operation would encroach on his property. The Dean of Guild, considering that the answers raised a question of heritable right which was outwith his jurisdiction, sisted process for twenty-one days to enable the respondent to bring an action for its determination in a competent Court. The respondent not having done so, the Dean of Guild granted the warrant prayed for. The respondent appealed on the ground that the onus should have been laid upon the petitioner of proving his right. Held that the petitioner having produced a title to the subjects occupied by him, which was ex facie good, the onus had been properly laid upon the appellant of disproving it. Wilson & Sons v. Mackay's Trustees, Oct. 18, 1895, p. 13.
7. In a petition by the Police Board of Greenock to the Dean of Guild under the Greenock Police Act, 1877, to recover the expense of repairing the retaining wall of a stream which bounded a street, the petitioners alleged that the wall was the property of the respondent. The respondent, who admitted that he was proprietor of the solum on which the wall rested, alleged that the wall was the retaining wall of the street and the property of the Police Board, and pleaded that a question of heritable right having been raised the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction. The Dean of Guild allowed a proof. In an appeal the Court held that there was no question of heritable right, and repelled the plea of no jurisdiction. Greenock Police Board v. Shaw Stewart, June 4, 1896, p. 776.

R. & Company. The pursuers further averred that the proceeds of these acceptances were placed to the credit of D. R. & Company's overdrawn account, and that if they had not been so applied the bank's ultimate loss would have been so much the greater. That D. R. & Company were sequestrated, and the pursuers, as the bills fell due, paid them under protest.* Held that the action was not relevant, in respect (1) that the pursuers were not entitled to rely on the oral

S. carried on the work, employing B as a servant and paying him wages, and also paying for materials which B ordered. CESSIO. Process—Appeal—Competency—Value of cause—Affidavit and claim—Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 22—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, sec. 26 (4).

1. A creditor who had poinded some of his debtor's effects, thereafter lodged an affidavit and claim in the latter's cessio in which he stated the amount of the debt due to him to be £42, and claimed a preferable ranking to the effect of receiving full payment of his debt out of the poinded effects. The trustee admitted his claim to an ordinary ranking only, and his deliverance was sustained by the Sheriff. The value of the poinded effects was £18. The creditor appealed to the Court of Session. The trustee objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the only question was the creditor's right to a preferable ranking, and that the actual sum in dispute was therefore below £25. Held that the appeal was competent, the value of the cause falling to be ascertained as in an ordinary Sheriff Court action, viz., by the amount of the claim made in the conclusions of the summons, or other initial writ, which here was the affidavit and claim.

Observations by Lord M'Laren on the right of appeal in cessio by reclaiming note under 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56. Henderson v. Grant, March 17, 1896, p. 659.

Poinding—Delay in selling poinded effects—Supervening cessio of debtor—Right of poinding creditor to a preference.

2. A creditor executed a poinding of his debtor's effects on 25th July 1893, but took no further steps in the poinding, the debtor having from time to time made payments to account. Sixteen months thereafter the debtor took out cessio, and the poinding creditor lodged a claim to a preferable ranking in the cessio. Held that there had been undue delay on the creditor's part in following out his diligence by a sale of the poinded effects, and that the poinding was in consequence inept to found a preference.

Opinion on the question whether there is a complete transference to the creditor of the property in the poinded effects before their sale has been carried through reserved by Lord Kinnear. Henderson v. Grant, March 17, 1896, p. 659.

2. A testator, who died in 1879, directed his trustees on the occurrence of a certain event to pay £3500 to the minister and kirk-session of a church in Edinburgh in trust for maintaining a male and a female missionary in connection with the congregation. In 1895, when the sum became payable, the minister and kirk-session presented a petition to the Court stating that a mission-hall was essential to the successful prosecution of mission work, and that the income of the fund, which would not probably exceed £100, would be insufficient to support two missionaries, and praying the Court to approve a scheme giving authority to the petitioners to spend £1000 in erecting a mission-hall and to employ the income of the remainder in supporting one missionary. The Court, having regard to the fact that the trustees had not accepted office, and considering that it had not been shewn that the testator's scheme was impracticable, refused the petition. 3. A church in Manchester was held by trustees under a trust-deed which entitled them to sell the church, it being declared that in the event of a sale the proceeds should be held by the trustees for such purposes as the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh should direct. The church was sold, and in consequence the congregation was dissolved. The minister raised an action against the Presbytery of Edinburgh and the trustees for declarator that a majority of the Presbytery might competently direct the trustees to make payment to the pursuer of such sums as the majority of the Presbytery might appoint by way of compensation to the pursuer for loss of stipend or otherwise. The pursuer averred that a majority of the members of the Presbytery were willing to direct an allowance to be made to him if they were satisfied of the competency of doing so. Held that the action was not relevant, as the pursuer's statement did not shew that he was an object of the power given to the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh. Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh, March 17, 1896, p. 668.

Church—Conditional Bequest—Forfeiture.

4. A testatrix, who died in 1876, by a settlement, dated in 1875, directed her trustees to set apart the sum of £3000, and to pay the interest arising therefrom to the incumbent for the time being of St James's Episcopal Church, Aberdeen, "so long as the congregation worshipping in said church shall not be united to, or in connection with, the Scottish Episcopal Church." She further declared that in the event, inter alia, of the congregation at any time "uniting or being in connection with" the Scottish Episcopal Church, the trustees should be bound to pay over the £3000 among her residuary legatees. In an action raised by the residuary legatees in 1895 for declarator that the legacy had become payable to them, on the ground that St James's Church was in connection with the Episcopal Church, the Court, after a proof, granted decree, holding that no overt act on the part of the congregation as such was necessary to create a connection in the sense of the trust-deed, and that such a connection was instructed by the facts proved, and in particular by the fact that the incumbents openly and in the knowledge of the congregation accepted the licence of the Scottish Episcopal Bishop of Aberdeen, and presented to him candidates for confirmation, thereby obtaining for themselves and the congregation many of the benefits arising from a connection with the School—Alteration of scheme framed under Educational Endowments Act, 1882.

In a petition presented by the Governors of a charitable institution for the alteration of a scheme framed by the Educational Endowment Commissioners for the administration of the charity, the Court sanctioned a scheme for transferring the use of school buildings and funds applicable to teachers' salaries, which had hitherto been devoted to the free elementary education of poor children, to a school board for the sole purpose of providing efficient secondary education to which a certain number of poor children should be admitted without charge, secondary education being a purpose for which the school board was not entitled to levy rates. Governors of Jonathan Anderson Trust, March 12, 1896, p. 592.
Trustees of an educational endowment, who were bound by the scheme framed for the administration of the fund to maintain a primary school for the benefit of a particular district, applied to the Court to amend the scheme by providing for the application of the fund to the establishment of bursaries, to enable scholars to prosecute their studies at secondary schools. They proposed that the bursaries should be open to scholars from a wider area than that previously benefited. The Court, while approving of the purpose to which it was proposed to apply the fund, declined to sanction the extension of its benefits to a wider area than that to which it had been destined by the testator. Governors of Bell's Trust, June 9, 1896, p. 780.
School—Petition for amendment of scheme for administration of educational endowment—Consent of Scotch Education Department—Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 20.
A petition for the amendment of a scheme framed for the administration of an educational endowment by the Educational Endowments Commissioners bore to be presented with the consent of the Scotch Education Department, as required by section 20 of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, but in point of fact the consent of the Department was not given until after the date of an interlocutor appointing intimation and service. Held that although the presentation of the petition was a reprehensible irregularity, the consent given pendente processu entitled the Court to entertain the application. URCH. Minister—Stipend—Burgh.
In 1809 the magistrates and town-council of a burgh and certain of the proprietors of a chapel of ease in the burgh, brought a summons in the Court of Teinds, concluding for the disjunction of certain portions of an existing parish, partly burghal and partly landward, the erection of these disjoined portions into a new parish under the proviso that the landward portion should be annexed quoad sacra only, and concluding further for declarator that the magistrates should be bound to provide the minister of the new parish in a "competent stipend." In this action the Court pronounced an interlocutor, by which they decerned, "in the disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra as libelled, on the magistrates . . . engaging to be answerable for a stipend of £200 per annum." The magistrates thereupon by an act of council undertook to be answerable for a stipend of "not less than £200 per annum." In 1895 the minister of the parish brought an action for declarator that the magistrates were bound to provide him in a competent stipend suited to the circumstances of the time and the position of the benefice, and for decree for payment of £400 a year as such stipend, contending that the words "as libelled" applied, inter alia, to the conclusion for declarator that the magistrates should be bound to provide the minister "in a competent stipend." The Court assoilzied the defenders, holding that the Court of Teinds had decerned "as libelled" only in regard to the conclusions for disjunction, erection, and annexation quoad sacra, and that the magistrates were liable for a stipend of £200 a year only. Dissenting Church—Suspension of Minister—Reduction—Restoration to status.

7. A minister of the United Presbyterian Church was served with a libel for an alleged offence, and was suspended from the ministry till the decision of the case. After a proof, the Presbytery found the charge proved. The minister appealed to the Synod, who remitted the case to a commission. The commission found certain counts in the libel proved, and suspended the minister sine die. The minister brought an action (1) for declarator that he had been libelled and suspended contrary to the rules of the Church; (2) "in case it may be necessary," for reduction of the decree of suspension pronounced by the commission; and (3) for interdict against the defenders proceeding to fill his charge, or deprive him of the status or emoluments of his office. He reserved his right to claim damages. The pursuer having intimated that he did not insist in the conclusions for declarator and interdict, but only in that for reduction of the sentence of the commission, the Court dismissed the conclusion for reduction, on the grounds (1) that that conclusion was merely ancillary to the conclusions for declarator and interdict; and (2) that reduction of the sentence by the commission would leave the pursuer under the original suspension, and would not restore his status as a minister, or lead to the establishment of any patrimonial right. Skerret v. Oliver, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 468.

Dissenting Church—Contract—Suspension of Minister—Reduction—Specific Implement—Restoration to office.

8. In an action by a minister of a congregation of the United Presbyterian Church against the Synod concluding (1) for reduction of a sentence of suspension pronounced against him by a committee of the Synod to whom the Synod had remitted the trial of a libel against him, on the allegation that it was ultra vires of the Synod to make the remit, and (2) for interdict against the defenders filling up his charge, held by CHURCH—Continued.

Lord Kincairney (1) that the pursuer had relevantly averred a breach of contract, causing an injury which was of a patrimonial character, or of a character equivalent to patrimonial; (2) that the suspension by the committee being alleged to be ultra vires, appeal to the Court was not excluded by a provision in the contract that members should not have recourse to the civil Courts against judgments of the Courts of the Church; but (3) that reduction of the sentence of suspension, to the effect of restoring the pursuer to office, was not a remedy which the Court ought to grant, or was in use to grant, in similar cases, and that the action fell to be dismissed. Skerret v. Oliver, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 468.

Dissenting Church—Action to reduce decree of suspension—Who must be called as defenders—Citation of Synod and Presbytery.

9. In an action by a minister of the United Presbyterian Church, for reduction of a decree suspending him from his office, and for restoration to his office, with its emoluments, held by Lord Kincairney (Ordinary), and acquiesced in (1) that it was sufficient to call as defenders the prosecuting members of the Presbytery, the Synod, and a commission of the Synod by whom the sentence complained of had been pronounced; (2) that the Synod was validly cited by its office-bearers being called; and (3) that the Presbytery was not a proper defender, but was validly cited for its interest, by its office-bearers being called. Skerret v. Oliver, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 468.

1. Where a private partnership conveyed its whole assets to a joint stock company limited by shares, consisting exclusively of the same partners, in consideration of each partner getting shares in the new company equal in value to his holding in the old partnership, held that the conveyance was a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that the disposition was chargeable with ad valorem stamp-duty on the value of the stock transferred. Promoter—Remuneration—Law-agent's and engineer's expenses incident to passing Act of Parliament—Trust—Auctor in rem suam—Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884, sec. 78.

2. The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act of 1884 by section 78 enacted that "the company shall pay all costs charges and expenses of and incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of this Act or otherwise in relation thereto." Held that the engineer and law-agent of the Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company were not barred from receiving remuneration for professional services rendered by them incident to the preparation for obtaining and passing the company's Act of Parliament, or otherwise in relation thereto, by reason of their being promoters of the Act at the time when such services were rendered. 3. The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Act, 1884, sec. 78, provides that "the company shall pay all costs charges and expenses of and incident to the preparing for obtaining and passing of this Act or otherwise in relation thereto." Held that a promoter of a company who had obtained from a bank on his own individual credit the sum required for the parliamentary deposit in connection with the Company's Act, was not entitled to charge a commission for so doing against the company. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann, July 15, 1896, p. 1056.

Promoter—Remit to Taxing-Master of the House of Commons to tax promoter's account—Finality of report.

4. In an action of accounting brought by a public company against one of its promoters, the defender lodged certain counter claims. The account of these lodged by the defender was remitted to the Taxing-Master of the House of Commons, who taxed the account. The pursuer lodged objections to the report, mainly on the ground that the Taxing-Master did not state in detail the method adopted by him in dealing with disputed items. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor remitting these objections to the Taxing-Master. The Court recalled his interlocutor, in respect that it did not appear that the reporter had mistaken the duty entrusted to him, or come to a wrong conclusion on any matter of principle. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann, July 15, 1896, p. 1056.

Alteration of Memorandum of Association—Extension to new business—Confirmation by Court—Conditions—Change of name to indicate extended business—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, sec. 1.

5. The Scottish Accident Insurance Company, incorporated in 1877, under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance against accident, presented a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, for confirmation of a special resolution altering its memorandum of association so as to extend its business to life, sickness, employers' liability, and fidelity insurance. The Court granted the petition on condition that the name of the company was changed to the Scottish Accident, Life, and Fidelity Insurance Company, or to such other name as might be approved of by the Board of Trade, and by the Court, to indicate the extended nature of the company's business. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited, March 12, 1896, p. 586.

6. A limited company formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of employers' liability and accident insurance presented a petition craving the Court to confirm a special resolution altering the company's memorandum of association so as to make the objects of the company include sickness and guarantee insurance. The Court held that, before the petition could be granted, the name of the company must be altered so as to indicate the proposed extension of its business. Scottish Employers' Liability, &c., Assurance Co., Limited, July 11, 1896, p. 1016.

Alteration of memorandum of association—Extension to new business—Petition for confirmation—Intimation.

7. A company formed for the purpose of carrying on the business of employers' liability and accident insurance presented a petition craving the Court to confirm a special resolution altering the company's memorandum of association so as to make the objects of the company include sickness and guarantee insurance. Held that intimation of the proposed extension of the company's business must be made by advertisement.

Observations by the Lord President to the effect that in preparing petitions more attention should be paid to the question of what intimation should be craved. Scottish Employers' Liability, &c., Assurance Co., Limited, July 11, 1896, p. 1016.

Shares—Ultra vires—Allottees of illegal preference shares—Whether ordinary shareholders or creditors of company.

8. A limited company which, by the terms of its memorandum and original articles of association, was precluded from creating preference shares, by special resolution resolved that the remaining unissued shares of the nominal capital should be preference shares subject to these conditions: that they should bear a fixed rate of dividend; that any failure of the annual profits to meet the dividend should be made good from the profits of subsequent years; that after ten years the company had right to redeem these shares at par; that preference shareholders were not entitled to vote or take part in any meeting, or in the management of the company, or to share in the rights of ordinary shareholders. Preference shares were applied for and allotted. In a special case presented by an allottee of preference shares and the company, the company contended that, although the preference given to these shares was invalid, the allottee was to be regarded as a holder of ordinary shares. Held that, as the allottee of preference shares had not applied for or agreed to take ordinary shares, he was not to be regarded as an ordinary shareholder, but as a creditor of the company, and that he was entitled to repayment of the price of the shares, with interest at 4 per cent, less any dividend which he had received. Waverley Hydropathic Co., Limited, v. Barrowman, Nov. 20, 1895, p. 136.

Shares—Power of company to issue new shares to manager at a premium under market value as reward for past services.

9. Held (1) that it was competent for a limited company to give gratuities to its officials in consideration of services rendered, or to be rendered; and (2) that a resolution by the company at a general meeting to issue to its manager unissued shares at a premium less than might have been obtained on the market with the view of rewarding his past services and of securing his future services was not incompetent. Cameron v. Glenmorangie Distillery Co., Limited, July 17, 1896, p. 1092.

Reduction of capital—Dispensation with words "and reduced"—Motion for dispensation on presentation of petition for confirmation—Companies Act, 1877, sec. 4, subsec. 2.

10. On the presentation of a petition by a limited company for an order confirming the reduction of its capital, the Court, in virtue of the powers conferred by section 4, subsection 2, of the Companies Act, 1877, on the motion of the petitioners, dispensed in the meantime with the addition of the words "and reduced" to the name of the company. Albany Steam Shipping Co., Limited, Dec. 11, 1895, p. 272.

11. A limited company presented a petition for an order confirming a reduction of its capital resolved on by special resolution duly passed and confirmed by the company. In Single Bills the petitioners, on moving for intimation and advertisement, craved the Court to dispense, in the meantime, with the addition of the words "and reduced" to the name of the company, in virtue of the powers conferred by subsection 2 of section 4 of the Companies Act, 1877. The Court pronounced an interlocutor granting the dispensation "from this date, and until disposal of the petition." Colonial Real Property Co., Limited, March 2, 1896, p. 547.

Reduction of capital—Necessity for shewing loss of capital.

12. Petition by a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, for an order confirming a resolution to reduce the capital of the company, refused on the ground that the company had failed to satisfy the Court that any capital had been lost. City Property Investment Trust Corporation, Limited, v. Thorburn, Jan. 17, 1896, p. 400.

Reduction of capital—Ultra vires—Alteration of status of shareholders.

13. The memorandum of association of a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, whose capital consisted of preferred stock and deferred shares, the holders of the former being entitled to a preferential dividend of 5 per cent, and to preferential repayment of capital in the event of a liquidation, the deferred shareholders being entitled to the surplus profits and assets, set forth as one of the objects of the company,—"From time to time to convert the shares of capital . . . into shares or stock of one class, and with like privileges." Preferred stock was issued to the amount of £129,880, and deferred capital to the amount of £24,771, in all £154,651. Some years after its incorporation the company, on account of alleged loss of capital, adopted a scheme under which consolidated ordinary stock was to be issued in lieu of the existing capital of the company, the holders of preferred stock getting the new stock in the proportion of 95 per cent of their holdings, and the holders of deferred shares getting that stock in the proportion of 90 per cent of their holdings. In this way the capital of the company would be reduced from £154,651 to £145,679, 18s. The company having by a majority of votes passed and confirmed a resolution to reduce the capital from £154,651 to £145,679, 18s. by cancelling the existing preferred stock and deferred shares, and issuing ordinary stock to the smaller amount, presented a petition for confirmation of the proposed reduction of capital. Question, whether it was within the power of the company under the cover of a resolution to reduce capital to reconstruct the company on a basis essentially different from that on which it was constituted. City Property Investment Trust Corporation, Limited, v. Thorburn, Jan. 17, 1896, p. 400.

Voluntary Liquidation — Supervision Order — Additional Liquidator —Companies Act, 1862, secs. 147, 149, and 150.

14. A person alleging himself to be the principal ordinary creditor of a company which had gone into voluntary liquidation presented a petition for a supervision order, and for the appointment of an additional liquidator. The company had prior to the liquidation disputed the petitioner's claim against the company, and the company and its liquidator in their answers did not admit the claim. If established the petitioner's claim amounted to about four-fifths of the whole debts of the company. The respondents averred that (apart from uncalled capital) the assets would on realisation be sufficient to meet the entire claims against the company, including that of the petitioner. The petitioner denied this. The Court granted a supervision order, but refused to appoint an additional liquidator. Macquisten v. Adam, Sons, & Co., Limited, and Liquidator, June 27, 1896, p. 910.

Voluntary Liquidation—Petition for delivery of minute-book retained by secretary — Competency — Companies Act, 1862, secs. 100 and 138.

15. Held that a petition presented under sections 100 and 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, by the liquidator of a company which was being voluntarily wound up, to have the company's secretary ordained to deliver up its minute-book, was competent. Gladstone v. M'Callum, June 16, 1896, p. 783.

Retention—Lien—Minute-book of Company.

CONTRACT. Executory Contract—Trade Discount—Notice—Invoice.
1. A brewer entered into a verbal agreement with a retail dealer to supply him with beer, and to allow him 35 per cent discount when he paid an account. No arrangement was made as to the length of credit to be allowed, but with each consignment of beer an invoice was sent, on which was a printed notice which stated that accounts not paid within three months were not subject to discount. The attention of the dealer was not specially called to the terms of the invoices, and on more than one occasion during a course of dealing extending over two years, the dealer was allowed the usual discount upon accounts not paid within three months. In an action by the brewer for payment of the full amount of an account not paid within three months, held that by the original contract between the parties the price of the beer was fixed at 65 per cent of the nominal price; that this contract was not qualified by the terms of the invoices, and therefore that the defender was only liable for the amount of the account after deduction of 35 per cent. Buchanan & Co. v. Macdonald, Dec. 10, 1895, p. 264.
Sale—Cautioner.
2. B, a builder, in the course of erecting certain houses became unable to get building materials on his own credit and applied to S. S carried on the work, employing B as a servant and paying him wages, and also paying for materials which B ordered. S informed C & Co. of the arrangement and promised to see them paid for any materials supplied to B's order. Held that C & Co. had a claim against S as buyer of the goods. Stevenson's Trustee v. Campbell & Sons, March 20, 1896, p. 711.
Construction—Specialia derogant generalibus—Sale of medical practice, including book debts.
3. A firm of medical practitioners was dissolved by the death of one of the partners on 15th April 1894. On 21st July 1894 his widow and executrix agreed to sell to the assistant of the late firm "the deceased's whole right and interest in the practice carried on" by the firm, "consisting of (first) the deceased's share, right, and interest in the horses, harness, machines, and others"; (second) his share in the medical and surgical instruments and books; and (third) "the deceased's share, right, and interest in the book debts, including the goodwill of the business belonging to the firm," for £485, the purchaser undertaking to free and relieve the seller and the representatives of the deceased "of all debts and obligations due by the said firm . . . in any manner of way whatsoever." Held that the sale embraced the deceased's whole interest in the assets of the firm, including not merely the book debts outstanding at the date of the agreement, but all fees received by the firm since the last division of profits on 31st January 1894. Alexander v. Alexander, May 13, 1896, p. 724.

Right of party to terminate agreement at pleasure—Shipbroker.

The offer was accepted by the company. The brokers took the shares, and the agreement was acted on for several years. Held that the agreement was not terminable at the pleasure of the company. CROFTERS HOLDINGS ACTS. Right of crofter to take sea-ware—Right in question with singular successors—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, sec. 12.

In 1894 the proprietor of lands within a crofting parish sold part of these lands, and thereafter the purchaser brought an action against crofters on the remaining portion of the seller's lands praying to have the defenders interdicted from gathering sea-ware on the sea-shore ex adverso of the lands sold. In defence the crofters averred that from time immemorial they and their predecessors in the crofts had been in use and had right to gather sea-ware from the sea-shore in question, and that in 1887 their rents were fixed by the Crofters Commission on the footing that they had that right. Held that the defenders were entitled to proof of their averments as to their right to gather sea-ware. Macdonald v. Macdougall, July 2, 1896, p. 941.

COUNTY COUNCIL. Assessment—Water—Whole parish supplied by one system of water-works—Burgh formed within parish after 1889, and created a special water supply district—Residue of parish formed into a separate water supply district—Management and maintenance—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 99.

1. In 1876 the Parochial Board of Wemyss, as the Local Authority under the Public Health Act, 1867, introduced a water supply for the whole parish from a source outside the parish, the only works within the parish being the distributing mains. On the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Kirkcaldy District Committee of the County Council of Fife came in place of the Parochial Board as Local Authority, and the water-works were vested in them. The requisite expenditure was levied upon the whole property in the parish. In 1891 a district of the parish was created a police burgh, and subsequently formed into a special water supply district. In 1892 the remaining part of the parish was formed into a special water supply district. The existing system of water-works for the supply of the whole parish was continued. In a question between the District Committee of the County Council and the Police Commissioners of the burgh, held (1) that the water supply and water-works fell to be managed by the subcommittee of the District Committee appointed under sec. 81 of the Local Government Act, 1889, and the Police Commissioners (or so many of the Police Commissioners as the Sheriff should fix as a committee) jointly; and (2) that the Police Commissioners were alone entitled to impose and levy the necessary assess-

2. In an action brought by a parliamentary burgh against a county council for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to assess the pursuers' lands within the burgh for county general assessment under the County General Assessment Act, 1868, held (1) that by secs. 26 and 27 of the Local Government Act, 1889, the whole assessing powers derived by a county council from prior Acts were merged in the power given to assess for consolidated rates, and that a county council had no other power to assess; and (2) that a county council's power to assess being limited to lands and heritages within the county as defined by the Act, they were not entitled to assess lands or heritages within a royal or parliamentary burgh. Road—Action to negative alleged right of way—Process—Sist—Sist to give County Council opportunity to intervene—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, sec. 42.
3. The proprietor of an estate brought an action against R., concluding for declarator that he held the estate free of any public right of way over a certain part of it, and for interdict against the defender entering upon it. R., who had used a path over the part of the estate in question for sixteen years, lodged defences. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. Shortly before the diet fixed for proof the defender moved the Lord Ordinary to sist the action, upon the ground that, his funds being exhausted, he was unable to make the necessary preparations for the proof, and that the case was being considered by the County Council, who were entitled under the Local Government Act, 1894, to take steps to vindicate rights of way. The Lord Ordinary refused the motion, and the defender having failed to appear at the proof the Lord Ordinary granted decree against R. as concluded for. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and sisted the action hoc statu upon an undertaking by the defender not to use the path during the sist. Alston v. Ross, Dec. 12, 1895, p. 273.

CUSTODY. Agreement to winter a horse—Injury to horse—Liability of custodier—Proof—Onus.
A farmer undertook to winter a colt belonging to a postmaster. In the course of the winter the colt was found to have sustained a serious injury to its right eye. The postmaster raised an action of damages against the farmer, averring that the injury to the colt's eye was caused by its being struck in the face by the defender, or some person for whom she was responsible; or otherwise, that the injury was caused through the colt's eye having come in contact with some of the sharp edges of the reed fence in which the colt, with culpable negligence, was enclosed, and pleaded that the injury having been caused by the fault or neglect of the defender, she was liable in damages. The Court assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had failed to prove that the accident to the colt had been caused by the fault of the defender. Sutherland v. Hutton, May 12, 1896, p. 718.

1. In 1808 Innes, proprietor of Ballogie, was infeft in that estate cum privilegio et libertate aucupandi in the Forest of Birse, which belonged to the Earl of Aboyne. By a judgment of the Court of Session in 1812, affirmed by the House of Lords in 1819, in an action by the Earl against Innes, it was found that the liberty and privilege of fowling was "a franchise conferred as a heritable right rendered an appendage to the property of Ballogie," and further, "that the said privilege may lawfully be exercised by the defender personally, or by his gamekeeper duly authorised for that purpose, or by any qualified friends whom he may permit, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not, or whether the defender be personally present or not, but always in such way and manner as not to be abusively exercised or encroach unreasonably on or absorb the general right of fowling as well as hunting belonging to the pursuer over the said forest." In 1896, in an action at the instance of the Marquis of Huntly, a successor of the Earl of Aboyne, to have the right of Ballogie defined, held that under the interlocutor of 1812 Ballogie was entitled, inter alia, (1) to let his right of shooting in the forest to any persons whether they were or were not tenants on Ballogie; and (2) to sell the game killed by him for sport. Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol, March 12, 1896, p. 610.

Correction of interlocutor by Clerk of Court before extract—Diligence—Suspension—Nobile officium.

2. In writing the interlocutor in a cause in which the Court had pronounced judgment for £41 in favour of the pursuer, the Clerk of Court, by a clerical error, wrote £14 for £41, and the interlocutor was signed by the presiding Judge. The Clerk corrected the error before extract, but failed to have the alteration authenticated by the Judge. The interlocutor having been extracted, the defender was charged to make payment, and the days of charge having expired without payment being made, the defender's goods were poinded. The defender thereupon presented in the Bill-Chamber a note of suspension of the decree and the proceedings thereon. The agents-disbursers of the pursuer, in whose name decree had been extracted and the charge given, presented a petition praying the Court to confirm and authenticate the Clerk of Court's amendment. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills reported the suspension. The Court informed the Lord Ordinary on the Bills that the interlocutor as amended correctly expressed the judgment of the Court, and held it to be unnecessary to pronounce any order on the petition. yet payable, under a guarantee from two of their number to indemnify them from all loss which they or the trust-estate might incur by continuing to hold the said deposit-receipts. Before the deposit-receipts matured the bank suspended payment. Held that neither the trustees nor the guarantors were liable to make good the loss sustained by the bank suspending payment, as it did not appear that the deposit-receipts could have been realised before they matured. Scott's Trustees v. Scott, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 52.

Succession—Donation—Destination.

2. On 20th September 1892 a brother and a sister took a deposit-receipt from a bank in these terms,—"Received of" the brother and the sister "the sum of £400 as a deposit with" the bank, "to be repaid on 15th July 1895 to them or the survivor of them, and bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum." Of the £400, £350 was contributed by the sister and £50 by the brother. Both the brother and the sister died before the date of repayment of the deposit-receipt, the brother being the survivor of the two. The sister was in possession of the deposit-receipt at her death. In an action by the executrix of the brother against the executor of the sister for delivery of the deposit-receipt, on the ground that its contents had passed to the brother as the survivor, held that the deposit-receipt had not the effect of transferring the property of the predeceaser to the survivor, and consequently that the pursuer's only right was to receive the £50 deposited by the brother, with interest. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor, Dec. 6, 1895, p. 234.

Foreign—Deposit-receipt issued by English bank to Scottish depositors—Whether rights of depositors inter se regulated by English law.

3. Two persons, domiciled and resident in Scotland, placed a sum of money, belonging in part to each, upon deposit-receipt with an English bank in their joint names. Held that all questions as to the right of the depositors inter se in the money deposited fell to be determined by Scots law, and not by the law of England. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor, Dec. 6, 1895, p. 234.

DILIGENCE. Process—Decree—Correction by Clerk of Court before extract—Suspension—Nobile officium.

In writing the interlocutor in a cause in which the Court had pronounced judgment for £41 in favour of the pursuer, the Clerk of Court, by a clerical error, wrote £14 for £41, and the interlocutor was signed by the presiding Judge. The Clerk corrected the error before extract, but failed to have the alteration authenticated by the Judge. The interlocutor having been extracted, the defender was charged to make payment, and the days of charge having expired without payment being made, the defender's goods were poinded. The defender thereupon presented in the Bill-Chamber a note of suspension of the decree and the proceedings thereon. The agents-disbursers of the pursuer, in whose name decree had been extracted and the charge given, presented a petition praying the Court to confirm and authenticate the Clerk of Court's amendment. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills reported the suspension. The Court informed the Lord Ordinary on the Bills that the interlocutor as amended correctly expressed the judgment of the Court, and held it to be unnecessary to pronounce any order on the petition. Clark & Macdonald v. Bain, Nov. 16, 1895, p. 102.

DISCHARGE. Reparation—Master and Servant.

In defence to an action of damages for personal injuries sustained by the pursuer when in the employment of the defenders, the defenders pleaded that the action was excluded by a receipt signed by the pursuer, and bearing that he had received from the defenders the sum of £10 as compensation for his injuries, "and this sum I accept in full discharge of all claims I can or may make in respect of said injury, either under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, or otherwise." With reference to this discharge the pursuer averred that the defenders' manager "called upon the pursuer within a week of his leaving the infirmary, and induced him, when he was in a weak state of body and mind, and without advice, to sign the receipt." The Court dismissed the action, holding that no relevant grounds had been stated for setting aside the discharge. Mackie v. Strachan, Kinmond, & Co., July 15, 1896, p. 1031.

DONATION. Succession—Deposit-receipt—Destination—Foreign.

On 20th September 1892 a brother and a sister who were domiciled in Scotland took a deposit-receipt from an English bank in these terms,—"Received of" the brother and the sister "the sum of £400 as a deposit with" the bank, "to be repaid on 15th July 1895 to them or the survivor of them, and bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum." Of the £400, £350 was contributed by the sister and £50 by the brother. Both the brother and the sister died before the date of repayment of the deposit-receipt, the brother being the survivor of the two. The sister was in possession of the deposit-receipt at her death. In an action by the executrix of the brother against the executor of the sister for delivery of the deposit-receipt, on the ground that its contents had passed to the brother as the survivor, held that the deposit-receipt had not the effect of transferring the property of the predeceaser to the survivor, and consequently that the pursuer's only right was to receive the £50 deposited by the brother, with interest. Dinwoodie's Executrix v. Carruthers' Executor, Dec. 6, 1895, p. 234.

ELECTION LAW. Franchise—Lodger Franchise—Claim and declaration—Presumption—Wilful refusal of claimant to answer citation as witness—The Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, sec. 14.

1. The Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885, by section 14, enacted,—"In the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger, the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall, for the purposes of revision, be prima facie evidence of his qualification." A person, claiming the lodger franchise in respect of a bedroom occupied by him in his father's house, produced at the Registration Court a notice of claim accompanied by the statutory declaration. The claim was objected to upon the allegation that the claimant had no contract with his father. The objector proposed to prove this by the evidence of the claimant himself, whom he had duly cited to attend. The claimant having failed to attend the diet, the Sheriff continued the case to an adjourned diet, to which the claimant was again cited. The claimant again failed to attend, and the objector led no evidence against the claim. The Sheriff sustained the claim. In a special case obtained by the objector, the Sheriff stated that he considered himself bound by the case of Dalgleish v. Dodds, 22 R. 198, to admit the claim, otherwise he would have held the claimant as confessed, and rejected it. The Court held that the case of Dalgleish v. Dodds did not apply, and that the Sheriff should have given effect to his view of the evidence and refused the claim. Stirling v. Fletcher, Nov. 19, 1895, p. 120.

Franchise—Service Franchise—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 3.

2. A coachman had the exclusive use and control of a room over the stable furnished as a bedroom, in which he kept his clothes and dressed, but he took his meals in the mansion-house occupied by his master, and slept there as caretaker. He claimed to be enrolled as a voter in respect that he inhabited the room over the stable as a dwelling-house by virtue of service in the sense of section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884. Held that he was not entitled to the franchise, in respect that the dwelling-house which he inhabited was not the room over the stables but the mansion-house, which was inhabited by the person under whom he served. Campbell v. Morris, Nov. 19, 1895, p. 118.

Election—Returning officer's charges—Presiding officers and clerks—"Travelling expenses"—Hotel expenses—Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1891, sec. 3, Schedule, Part I.

3. Held that the expression "travelling expenses" in the schedule to the Returning Officers (Scotland) Act, 1891, included hotel and other personal expenses necessarily incurred by a presiding officer. Ivory v. Macrae, Nov. 21, 1895, p. 155.

Election—Returning officer's charges—Deputy returning officer—Ballot Act, 1872, sec. 8.

4. Held that a deputy returning officer, remunerated as such, was not entitled to any fee for acting as a presiding officer at a parliamentary election. Ivory v. Macrae, Nov. 21, 1895, p. 155.

Election—Expenses incurred in the conduct and management of the election—Return of Expenses—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 8.

5. In February 1894 A was invited by a local Conservative Association to become the Unionist candidate for the county in the event of a Parliamentary election. A, in reply, stated, that in the event of an election he would consider the matter. Between that time and October he spent several weeks in the constituency, and addressed a large number of political meetings. He was absent from the county from the end of October till the end of May 1895, when he returned. On 21st June the ministry were defeated and a dissolution became imminent. A then became the recognised Unionist candidate. Held that the expenses incurred by A prior to 21st June 1895 were not expenses incurred "on account of, or in respect of, the conduct or management of" the election in the sense of sec. 8 of the Act. Hood v. Gordon, Nov. 23, 1895, p. 178.

Election—Polling Agent—Employment as subagent—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 17.

6. Held that the fee paid to a person as polling agent for a Parliamentary candidate was not to be regarded as to any extent a payment to him as a subagent merely because the polling agent voluntarily canvassed certain electors. Hood v. Gordon, Nov. 23, 1895, p. 178.

Election—Expenses—Political Associations.

7. In an election petition raising a question as to the sums to be included in the respondent's account of election expenses, it was proved that for two years prior to the election he had contributed £120 per annum to a local political association. The petitioner proposed to ask a witness to state the amount of the contributions by other persons. The Court disallowed the question.

Election—Election Agent—Payments.

8. Observation upon the duty of an election agent in regard to payments. Hood v. Gordon, Nov. 23, 1895, p. 178.

Election Petition—Application for leave to amend petition against the return of member—Inner-House—Election Judges—Remit—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 40, subsec. (2).

9. Held (1) that an application under sec. 40, subsec. (2), of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, for leave to amend a petition against the return of a member of Parliament must be presented to one of the Divisions and not to the Election Judges; and (2) that, on the application being granted, it is not necessary for the Division to remit the petition to the Election Judges to enable the latter to exercise the powers by statute conferred upon them. Hood v. Gordon, Oct. 16, 1895, p. 4.

Election Petition—Bribery—Treating—Illegal Practices—Statement of particulars—Specification.

10. In an election petition held that in the "statement of particulars" provided by rule 1 of the Additional Parliamentary Election Petition Rules, 1869, (1) with reference to allegations of bribery and treating, it was necessary to set forth the places where the alleged acts were committed, and the form in which the bribery was effected; (2) with reference to allegations of illegal payments made by political associations or clubs, it was necessary to state the individuals through whom the alleged payments were made, and the particular items complained of. Hood v. Gordon, Nov. 23, 1895, p. 171.

Election Petition—Jurisdiction—Diligence for recovery of documents—Citation of witnesses and havers—Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, secs. 2, 26, and 58.

11. Held that the Judges in an election petition have no jurisdiction to grant a diligence for recovery of documents prior to the trial, but may grant warrant to cite witnesses and havers in common form. Hood v. Gordon, Nov. 23, 1895, p. 171.

Election Petition—Expenses—Taxation—Agent and Client—Fees to third counsel—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 68, subsec. 17.

12. Section 68, subsection 17, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, enacts that the expenses in an election petition should be taxed as between agent and client. Held that in taxing the expenses in an election petition, the Auditor had rightly refused to allow the successful party the fees of a third counsel. Hood v. Gordon, March 18, 1896, p. 675.

ENTAIL. Direction to entail—Succession—Condition—Direction to entail "on my heirs so long as the estate of C. is theirs"—Clause of devolution.

1. Robert Moubray died in 1875, leaving a holograph will, by which he directed his trustees to accumulate the income of his estate until it reached £41,000, and with the accumulated sum to purchase lands "as near to the estate of Cockairnie as possible, and as strictly as the law of Scotland will allow to entail such lands purchased as above on my heirs direct or collateral so long as the estate of Cockairnie is theirs." At the date of this will the estate of Cockairnie belonged in fee-simple to William Moubray, the immediate younger brother of the testator. William Moubray died in 1885, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated in 1879, by which he directed his trustees to hold the estate of Cockairnie for the use and behoof of Captain Moubray, his eldest son, and the heirs of Captain Moubray's body, whom failing of his second and other sons in their order respectively, and the heirs of their bodies respectively, subject to the condition, inter alia, that in respect that he, William Moubray, was next heir to the estates of Upwood and Woodwalton in England, and that it was his wish that the heir who should succeed after him to these estates should not also take the estate of Cockairnie, his trustees were to convey Cockairnie to the child who might be entitled thereto other than the heir who should succeed to Upwood and Woodwalton. At the adjustment of a deed of entail after the £41,000 had been accumulated, the younger brother of Captain Moubray, and the first substitute under the Cockairnie trust, contended that—having regard (1) to Robert Moubray's clearly expressed intention that the lands to be purchased should be possessed along with the lands of Cockairnie, and (2) to the fact that Cockairnie was held upon a title which provided for a devolution of that estate from the heir in possession to the next heir in the event of the former succeeding to the estates of Upwood and Woodwalton—the trustees in framing a deed of entail of the estates to be purchased were bound to insert a clause of devolution to the same effect to secure that the lands to be purchased should be possessed along with Cockairnie. Held that no clause of devolution fell to be inserted. Moubray's Trustees v. Moubray, June 16, 1896, p. 809.

Trust-disposition—Construction—"Heirs-female."

2. A truster, "in order to make and secure additional provision for" his second son "and the other heirs of entail succeeding him in the lands and estates of Cromartie . . . to enable them to support the dignity and title of Earl of Cromartie," conveyed to trustees certain securities, and directed them, after his death, to pay the free proceeds thereof to his second son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to certain substitutes, "whom failing to the heirs-female of the body" of the said second son. The second son, the Earl of Cromartie, died leaving only two daughters, of whom the elder succeeded her father in the title and estates of Cromartie. Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the direction to the trustees to pay the income to the "heirs-female" of the body of the second son being unambiguous, must receive effect, and that each of the two daughters was entitled to one half of the income of the trust funds. Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire, May 15, 1896, H. L., p. 32.

Provision by heir of entail for younger children—Succession—Vesting—Trust—Marriage-Contract.

3. C, an heir of entail in possession, by his marriage-contract, in the exercise of a power under the deed of entail, bound the succeeding heirs to pay to the trustees a sum equal to three years' rent of the entailed estate, in trust for behoof of the children of the marriage not succeeding to the entailed estate, in such shares as C should appoint, and failing appointment, to be held by the trustees for the younger children alive at C's death equally, or their issue. As a further provision for his younger children, he assigned to his trustees certain policies of assurance on his life under similar conditions as to apportionment. In contemplation of the marriage of R, his third son, C executed a deed appointing to R or his lawful issue or assigns £1500 as his share of the total trust funds. This deed was declared to be delivered on execution, and to be irrevocable, and R was taken bound to assign his rights under it to his marriage-contract trustees. R predeceased his father. Held that R's right to the £1500 was not contingent on his surviving his father, and that it vested at the date of the appointment in his favour. Chancellor's Trustees v. Sharples' Trustees, Jan. 24, 1896, p. 435.

Restriction of provisions to Widow and Children—5 Geo. IV. c. 87 (Aberdeen Act), secs. 1 and 4—Free yearly rent—Mineral Lease—Royalties—Approaching exhaustion of minerals.

4. Held by a majority of seven Judges, that in estimating the provisions which an heir of entail is entitled under sections 1 and 4 of the Aberdeen Act to make for his widow and children, the royalties payable under mineral leases during the year current at the date of the granter's death fall to be taken as part of the "free yearly rent" of the entailed estate, irrespective of the fact that the minerals are nearly exhausted. Lord Belhaven and Stenton, Jan. 23, 1896, p. 423.

ERROR. Sale—Sale of heritage—Sale by auction—Implement in knowledge of ground of challenge—Personal objection—Private knowledge of prior right. Moncrieff v. Lawrie, March 6, 1896, p. 577.

EXECUTOR. Executor-nominate—Confirmation—Danger to estate—Judicial Factor.

1. Circumstances in which the Court dismissed a petition for confirmation presented by the widow and executrix-nominate of a person deceased and appointed a judicial factor on the estate, in respect that prima facie there was risk of injury to the estate if the administration were left in the hands of the petitioner. Campbell v. Barber, Nov. 7, 1895, p. 90.

Compensation—Retention—Mutuality of debt and credit—Bank—Claim of bank to retain against debt of deceased customer funds lodged by his executors.

Liability of executor to creditors of deceased—Where executor has carried on deceased's business—Bankruptcy.

3. The executrix-dative of a deceased wine and spirit merchant, having obtained a transfer of the certificate for the sale of exciseable liquors into her own name, continued the deceased's business. Eighteen months after the death of the deceased his estates were sequestrated, and the trustee in the sequestration called upon the executrix to deliver the certificate and licence to him, to cede possession of the licensed premises, and to account for the profits she had made by carrying on the business. Held that the executrix was not a trustee for the creditors of the deceased, and therefore, that she was only liable to account for the value of the estate of the deceased, including the good-will of his business, as at the date of his death. Stewart's Trustee v. Stewart's Executrix, May 21, 1896, p. 739.

Proof—Writ—Writ of Executor.

4. Held that an affidavit in support of a claim for return of inventory-duty in which an executor deponed that he had actually paid debts "due and owing from the deceased at the time of his death," including a debt due to A, was not evidence of the constitution of a debt due to A. Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy, March 12, 1896, p. 621.

EXPENSES. Awarding of expenses—Reduction of Sheriff Court decree which had been extracted within the time allowed for appeal.

1. The defenders in a Sheriff Court action having obtained decree of absolvitor, with expenses, on 1st December, extracted the decree on 26th December, without waiting for approval of the Auditor's report on their account. The pursuers having brought an action for reduction of the Sheriff's interlocutor, in which they obtained a judgment in their favour in the Inner-House, the defenders submitted that they were entitled to the expenses of the proceedings in the Outer-House, in respect that these had been caused by the pursuers neglecting to appeal against the Sheriff's judgment within fourteen days, before the expiry of which extract could not have been obtained. The Court found the pursuers entitled only to expenses in the Sheriff Court and in the Inner-House. Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gavigan, July 3, 1896, p. 945.

Awarding of expenses—Jury Trial.

2. The Court has a discretion in jury trials, as in other cases, to depart from the general rule whereby expenses follow the event. Shepherd v. Elliot, March 20, 1896, p. 695.

Awarding of expenses—Amendment of Record in Inner-House.

3. An amendment of record in the Inner-House which did not involve any radical alteration of the pleadings, or a change of the ground of action, allowed on payment of expenses in the Inner-House. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 449.

EXPENSES—Continued.

Awarding of expenses—Sale of heritage—Objection to title tendered.

4. Circumstances in which a purchaser of heritable subjects who objected to the title offered him was held entitled to expenses incurred in defending an action by the seller, in which the validity of the title tendered was established. Walker v. Galbraith, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 347.

Parties liable—Dominus litis.

5. Held (per Lord Kyllachy, Ordinary) that in order to make a person liable as dominus litis for expenses decerned for in an action to which he was no party, it must be established that he was truly the principal in the action, and that the actual litigant was merely his agent. Fraser v. Malloch, March 12, 1896, p. 619.

Parties liable—Separate defences—Liability of defenders inter se—Trust.

6. A law-agent was appointed sole trustee, and was left a legacy under the will of a client, which the law-agent had himself prepared. An action for the reduction of the will was brought against (first) the law-agent, and (second) the residuary legatee, who was a pupil, and to whom a curator ad litem was appointed, on the ground that the first defender had by fraud or circumvention impetrated the will from the testator, who was weak and facile. Separate defences were lodged. The jury returned a verdict for both the defenders. In dealing with expenses the Court found the pursuer liable to the first defender as trustee, and found the latter personally liable to the second defender, the curator ad litem, on the ground that his action in taking benefit under the will which he had himself prepared had so prejudiced the case that, but for the separate defence, the jury might have disregarded the pupil's interest, and returned a verdict for the pursuer. Rooney v. Cormack, Oct. 18, 1895, p. 11.

Taxation—Separate defences—Objection to Auditor's report.

7. Observed by the Lord President that, where successful defenders have appeared separately, the appropriate time for determining whether they are entitled to the expense of separate defences is when the motion for expenses is made. Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1895, p. 80.

Taxation—Expenses as between agent and client—Fees to third counsel—Election Petition—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, sec. 68, subsec. 17.

8. Section 68, subsection 17, of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, enacts that the expenses in an election petition should be taxed as between agent and client. Held that in taxing the expenses in an election petition, the Auditor had rightly refused to allow the successful party the fees of a third counsel. Hood v. Gordon, March 18, 1896, p. 675.

Taxation—Expenses between agent and client, or between party and party—Process—Interlocutor—Trust.

9. In an action by a sole testamentary trustee for his discharge, the Court pronounced an interlocutor decerning for the balance due to him on an accounting, finding him entitled to "expenses," appointing him to denude of the trust-estate on receiving payment of said balance and of his expenses, and thereafter discharging him. The Auditor taxed the pursuer's account of expenses as between party and party. The pursuer objected to the Auditor's report, on the ground that the account should have been taxed as between agent and client. The defenders pleaded that the objection came too late. Held that the intention of the Court in finding the pursuer entitled to expenses was that he should be kept indemnis in respect he was denuding of the whole trust-estate, and therefore that the account fell to be taxed as between agent and client. Davidson's Trustees v. Simmons, July 17, 1896, p. 1117.

FISHINGS. Right to Salmon-Fishings—Glebe—Designation—Kirk lands—Presumption—Prescription—Crown—Act 1593, cap. 165.

1. In 1892 the proprietor of Ardoe brought an action against the proprietor of Banchory and of the Kirkton of Banchory for declarator that the pursuer had right to the salmon-fishings in the river Dee ex adverso of a certain portion of the glebe of Banchory-Devenick, which separated the estates of the pursuer from those of the defender at the river. No right of salmon-fishings attached to the glebe. The Crown was not called as a party to the action. The pursuer's lands of Ardoe were abbot's lands, as also were the lands forming the barony of Banchory: the lands of Kirkton of Banchory were bishop's lands. The glebe of Banchory-Devenick was designated in 1602, but the minutes of the presbytery did not shew out of what lands it had been designated. The defender maintained that it had been designated wholly out of Kirkton of Banchory, and consequently that the fishings in dispute belonged to him. Held, after a proof (rev. judgment of the First Division), (1) that in the absence of direct evidence as to the lands from which the glebe had been designated in 1602, it was to be inferred that the glebe had been taken from the abbot's lands of Banchory and Ardoe, and not from the bishop's lands of Kirkton, the presumption being that the Presbytery had followed the direction of the Act 1593, cap. 165, which was then in force; (2) that the pursuer's possession was sufficient, and that the possession by both parties shewed the boundary between the salmon-fishings of the barony of Banchory and Ardoe; and (3) that the pursuer had right (as in a question with the defender) to the fishings in dispute. Ogston v. Stewart, March 26, 1896, H. L., p. 16.

Right to Salmon-Fishings—Prescription—Conveyancing Act, 1874.

2. A right of salmon-fishing is an estate in land in the sense of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and the possession of salmon-fishings for twenty years is prescriptive possession. Ogston v. Stewart, March 26, 1896, H. L., p. 16.

Sea-Fishing — Beam-Trawling — Fishery Board — Statute — Bye-law—Ultra vires—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 7.

4. Held that under section 7 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Fishery Board had merely a discretionary power to prohibit trawling in particular areas within the line specified, and therefore that a bye-law issued by the board prohibiting trawling throughout the whole area within the line was ultra vires. Green v. Leith, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 50.

5. Held (by a majority of a Court of seven Judges, over-ruling Green v. Leith, supra, No. 4) that it was within the powers of the Fishery Board under the section to issue a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling in the entire area within the line specified. Wilson v. Rust; Wilson v. Mackenzie, Feb. 29, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 56.

Sea-Fishing — Fishery Board—Statute—Bye-law—Complaint—Penalty—Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 7—Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, sec. 10.

6. The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 7, enacts (subsection 1) that "the Fishery Board may, by bye-law or bye-laws, direct that the methods of fishing known as beam-trawling or otter-trawling shall not be used within a line drawn from Duncansby Head, in Caithness-shire, to Rattray Point, in Aberdeenshire"; and (subsection 2) that any person fishing in contravention of such bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence. In 1892 the Fishery Board issued a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the limits specified, and setting forth that any person acting in contravention of the bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence. The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, sec. 10, repealed sec. 7, subsec. 2, of the Act of 1889, and substituted for the penalties there provided a fine not exceeding £100, and failing payment imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days. A person was convicted of a contravention of the bye-law on a complaint which set forth that the accused was liable in a penalty not exceeding £100, and failing payment to imprisonment, and prayed for the imposition of the penalties provided by the Act of 1895. Held, in a suspension, that whether the penalty ought to have been specified in the bye-law or not, as it was in fact specified, and as the complaint was founded on the bye-law, the conviction fell to be quashed, as the penalty prayed for was in excess of that specified in the bye-law. Green v. Leith, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 50.

7. Held (over-ruling Green v. Leith, supra, No. 6) (1) that the portion of the bye-law relating to penalties ought not to have been included in the bye-law, and was to be regarded as nothing more than a superfluous intimation by the Fishery Board of the statutory penalties incurred by a contravention of the bye-law at the date when the bye-law was framed; (2) that the bye-law, in so far as it prohibited beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the line from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point, remained in force notwithstanding the passing of the Act of 1895; and (3) that after the passing of the Act of 1895 the penalties incurred on conviction of a contravention of the bye-law were those specified in that Act, and not those specified in the Act of 1889. Therefore (1) where a complaint set forth that the accused was liable to a penalty not exceeding £100, and, failing payment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, and prayed for the imposition of the penalty provided by the Act of 1895, held that the complaint was well laid; but (2) where a complaint set forth that the accused had incurred a penalty not exceeding £5, and prayed for the imposition of the penalty provided by the bye-law and by the Acts of 1889 and 1895, held that the complaint was incompetent. FRIENDLY SOCIETY. Process — Appeal — Competency — Dispute between member and society—Small-Debt Court—Friendly Societies Act, 1875, sec. 22 (d) (e).

Held that in a small-debt action relative to a dispute between a friendly society and one of its members, an appeal, on a case stated under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, was competent, although the summons did not refer to the Act. GAME. Construction of interlocutor declaring a right of fowling over lands belonging to another person—Extent of privilege—Right to let shooting.

In 1808 Innes, proprietor of Ballogie, was infeft in that estate cum privilegio et libertate aucupandi in the Forest of Birse, which belonged to the Earl of Aboyne. By a judgment of the Court of Session in 1812, affirmed by the House of Lords in 1819 in an action by the Earl against Innes, it was found that the liberty and privilege of fowling was "a franchise conferred as a heritable right rendered an appendage to the property of Ballogie," and further, "that the said privilege may lawfully be exercised by the defender personally, or by his gamekeeper duly authorised for that purpose, or by any qualified friends whom he may permit, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not, or whether the defender be personally present or not, but always in such way and manner as not to be abusively exercised or encroach unreasonably on or absorb the general right of fowling as well as hunting belonging to the pursuer over the said forest." In 1896, in an action at the instance of the Marquis of Huntly, a successor of the Earl of Aboyne, to have the right of Ballogie defined, held that under the interlocutor of 1812 Ballogie was entitled, inter alia (1) to let his right of shooting in the forest to any persons whether they were or were not tenants on Ballogie; and (2) to sell the game killed by him for sport. HORSE. Agreement to winter a horse—Injury to horse—Liability of custodier—Proof—Onus.

1. A farmer undertook to winter a colt belonging to a postmaster. In the course of the winter the colt was found to have sustained a serious injury to its right eye. The postmaster raised an action of damages against the farmer, averring that the injury to the colt's eye was caused by its being struck in the face by the defender, or some person for whom she was responsible; or otherwise, that the injury was caused through the colt's eye having come in contact with some of the sharp edges of the reed fence in which the colt, with culpable negligence, was enclosed, and pleaded that the injury having been caused by the fault or neglect of the defender, she was liable in damages. The Court assoilzied the defender, on the ground that the pursuer had failed to prove that the accident to the colt had been caused by the fault of the defender. Sutherland v. Hutton, May 12, 1896, p. 718.

Sale—Warranty—Proof of warranty—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 14.

2. Circumstances in which held that an oral statement, by a dealer in horses to a purchaser who said that he wished to buy a horse quiet to ride and drive, that a horse was quiet to ride and drive, did not imply a warranty. Wilson v. Turnbull & Co., May 12, 1896, p. 714.
3. The purchaser of a horse the second day after he received it rejected it on the ground that it had been warranted quiet to ride and drive, and that it was disconform to warranty. It appeared that on the day after

it had been put in the purchaser's stable it had been tried in the saddle by the purchaser and had given satisfaction, that on the following day the purchaser drove it in a dogcart along a road new to it, and that on coming near a bridge over a railway it was scared by the steam of a train which it could not see; that it then reared and turned round and refused to proceed. Opinion, per cur., that even if the warranty were proved the conduct of the horse in the exceptional circumstances in which it was placed did not shew that it was not quiet to drive, and that the purchaser was not entitled to reject it without further trial. HUSBAND AND WIFE. Breach of Promise of Marriage—Diligence for recovery of documents disclosing defender's financial position.
1. In an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage the pursuer moved for a diligence to recover the defender's business books and bank books in order to disclose his financial position. Circumstances in which the Court refused the motion. Somerville v. Thomson, March 6, 1896, p. 576.

Divorce for desertion—Separation—Cruelty—Charge of immoral conduct not amounting to adultery, and unknown to spouse founding on it until actions in Court—Relevancy.
2. A husband brought an action of divorce for desertion against his wife, who stated in defence that she had left her husband on account of his continued cruelty. The wife also brought an action for separation on the ground of cruelty against the husband. After the records had been closed the wife craved leave to add in both cases an averment of facts which had come to her knowledge subsequent to the closing of the records, to the effect that, while she was still living with her husband, he had attempted on one occasion to have connection with her niece. The Lord Ordinary (Low) having allowed an amendment in both actions, the Court refused to interfere with his decision, holding that proof of the alleged misconduct of the husband might be relevant as shewing his animus towards his wife, although that misconduct, being unknown to the wife, could not constitute a case of cruel maltreatment. A v. B, March 12, 1896, p. 588.

Divorce—Competency of decerning for aliment in pending action of separation and aliment after decree of divorce at instance of wife.
3. A wife, after obtaining an interim award of aliment in an action of separation and aliment against her husband, raised an action of divorce against him, and obtained decree therein. She then, in the action of separation and aliment, moved for decree for a further sum in name of aliment. Except the sum paid under the interim award she had received nothing from her husband in name of aliment pending the actions, and she alleged that she had been alimented by third parties. The Court refused the motion as incompetent, in respect that there could be no decerniture for aliment in an action of separation and aliment after the parties had been divorced, an action of separation and aliment proceeding on the assumption that the parties were husband and wife. Shirrefs v. Shirrefs, June 16, 1896, p. 807.

Divorce—Custody and aliment of children—Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861, sec. 9.
4. An order pronounced by a Lord Ordinary in an action of divorce, under the power conferred by section 9 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, to make provision for the custody and aliment of pupil children of the marriage, ceases to be operative in regard to each child when it emerges from pupillarity. Watson v. Watson, Nov. 28, 1895, p. 219.

Donation inter virum et uxorem—Implied revocation—Donation of heritage by husband—Subsequent granting of bond over property by him—Liability of wife for expenses connected with property.

5. A husband purchased a house, taking the title to himself and his wife, equally between them, and to their repective heirs and assignees. At the date of the purchase the house was burdened with a bond and disposition in security, and this was taken over in part payment of the price, the husband and the wife becoming liable in the personal obligation. Subsequently a second bond in security of a loan to the husband was granted over the property, the husband alone becoming liable in the personal obligation, and both he and his wife granting the disposition in security with joint consent and assent. The husband predeceased the wife, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he directed his trustees, in the first place, to pay all his just and lawful debts. The house having been sold by the trustees, with consent of the widow, held, in a competition between her and the trustees, that one half of the sum in the bonds and of the expense of discharging the same fell to be deducted from the widow's half of the price, as regarded the first bond, on the ground that the gift to the wife was to be taken cum onere, and as regarded the second bond, on the ground that the husband, by burdening the property with the bond, had by implication revoked the gift to the extent of one-half of that bond.

Held further that the following liabilities in connection with the property incurred but not discharged, in the husband's lifetime, viz. (1) for a law-agent's account, (2) for compositions due to the superior, (3) for the expense of confirming the title, and (4) for taxes, feu-duties, and incidental expenses, were personal debts of the husband, and were not chargeable against the widow's share of the price. INSANITY. Succession—Testament—Relevancy.

In a reduction of a will on the ground of the testator's insanity, a general averment that the testator was of unsound mind at the date when he made the will is not sufficient, if the facts stated or admitted by the pursuer raise a strong presumption that the testator was sane, and there is nothing in the will itself to indicate insanity. Hope v. Hope's Trustees, Feb. 19, 1896, p. 513.

INSURANCE. Life Insurance—Insurance by widower for benefit of children—Married Women's Policies of Assurance (Scotland) Act, 1880, sec. 2.

Accident Insurance—Condition—Warranty—Answers to questions by company—Agent and Principal—Personal Bar.

2. The widow of a person who had been killed by accident raised an action against an accident insurance company upon a policy taken out by the deceased. The defenders pleaded that the policy was void, in respect that it was subject to the condition that the declaration by the insured, upon which it was granted, was true; that in answer to the question in the proposal, "Are there any circumstances which render you peculiarly liable to accident?" the deceased had stated, "Slight lameness from birth," and had signed a declaration in the following terms:—"I hereby declare and warrant that the above statements are true"; and that the answer and declaration in material respects were false. It appeared from a proof that the deceased, while staying in a hotel in England, met an agent of the defenders' company with whom he was not acquainted, and was induced by him to make a proposal for an insurance; that the agent wrote the answers to the questions in the proposal as the deceased dictated them; that the deceased was and had been from childhood extremely lame, and could not have walked across a room without shewing the extent of his lameness. Several witnesses deponed that the deceased had told them that he walked across the room at the hotel before the agent, but the agent deponed that he never saw him rise from his seat. It was proved that some years after the deceased had fallen into a fireplace in his bedroom and had received injuries from which he died next day. The Court held (1) that the deceased's statement as to his walking across the room was true; (2) that as the defenders' agent must have seen the extent of his lameness, the defenders were not entitled to take advantage of any misdescription of the lameness in the proposal, as the knowledge of their agent was their knowledge; and (3) that no breach of warranty had been proved. Cruikshank v. Northern Accident Insurance Co., Limited, Nov. 21, 1895, p. 147.

INTERDICT. Reparation—Wrongous Interdict.

1. In an action of damages raised by the liquidator of a bleaching company, the pursuer stated that he had advertised a sale by auction of a large number of articles belonging to the bleachwork; that the defender, who had already bought the machinery of the bleachwork and other articles on the day before the sale, wrongfully obtained interim interdict against the sale proceeding; that of 266 articles included in the inventory prepared for the sale nine only were ultimately ascertained to belong to the defender, and that the interdict was unwarrantable quoad the articles belonging to the pursuer. The defender pleaded that the action was not relevant, in respect that in the circumstances set forth by the pursuer the defender was entitled to stop the sale until his rights should be ascertained. Held that the action was relevant.

Railway—Compulsory acquisition of lands—Arbitration—Interdict.

2. Note of suspension and interdict to stop proceedings in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, refused on the ground that the complainer had failed to shew that the respondent's claim to compensation was not relevant, or to shew any other cause for staying the proceedings in the arbitration. Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood, Nov. 27, 1895, p. 195.

Burgh—Street—Obstruction of street—Nuisance.

3. A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. The town-council, which was the Local Authority, approved of these operations. In a suspension and interdict brought by an inhabitant to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, held that as the Local Authority were entrusted with the duty of seeing that the streets were cleared in such emergencies as a heavy snowstorm, and as they approved of the methods employed by the tramway company, the note of suspension and interdict fell to be refused. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., Dec. 20, 1895, p. 340.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Patent.

4. A paint manufacturer in Aberdeen brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against a paint merchant there, to have him interdicted from making, using, and selling a paint which the pursuer alleged was an infringement of a patent which he had taken out. After the action was raised a paint manufacturer in Birmingham craved to be sisted as a defender, on the ground that he was the manufacturer of the paint sold by the defender, and thus had the real interest in defending the action. The Birmingham manufacturer was sisted accordingly. Thereafter the original defender withdrew from the action, interdict being pronounced against him, of consent and with the concurrence of the Birmingham manufacturer, and a record was made up between the pursuers and the Birmingham manufacturer, in which the latter raised the question of the validity of the pursuers' patent. After a proof, the Sheriff affirmed the validity of the patent, and granted interdict against the Birmingham manufacturer. In an appeal, held that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to pronounce this interlocutor. Gill v. Cutler, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 371.

Railway—Right of railway to exclude from station persons other than travellers—Exclusion of hotel servants wearing hotel badge.

5. The Perth General Station Committee presented a petition to the Sheriff to interdict A B, a hotelkeeper in Perth, "himself, or by his boots, or other servant . . . unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railway stations . . . of the pursuers; and in particular from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises connected therewith, while wearing the uniform or badge of the hotelkeeper, or of his hotel." The petitioners stated that they were proprietors of Perth Station; that on 17th July 1894 they intimated to A B that they had right to prevent, and would not permit, hotel servants wearing hotel badges to appear upon their platforms; that on various occasions in July 1895 A B had sent the boots of his hotel, wearing the hotel uniform and badge, to wait the arrival of certain trains, and that the latter on each occasion had been asked by the petitioners' servants to leave the station, but that he had refused to do so. The defender admitted that in July 1895 he had sent his hotel boots to meet customers arriving by train. The Sheriff refused the petition, and on appeal the Court affirmed the Sheriff's judgment, holding (1) that an interdict against the defender or his servants "unlawfully entering" the station could not be granted, as such an interdict would not specify the act forbidden; and (2) that quoad ultra the interdict sought was merely to prevent hotel servants entering the station in a certain dress to meet customers, and that that was not a case for interdict. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, June 26, 1896, p. 885.

INTEREST. Rate of Interest—Parent and Child—Legitim.

Where a son raised an action for payment of legitim thirteen years after his father's death, and election could not, owing to the son's minority, have been made at an earlier date, the Court held that the father's executrix was only liable in interest on the son's legitim at the rate which the money would have earned under prudent administration, and found her liable in interest at the rate of 4 per cent, that being the rate which the estate was admitted to have earned.

Opinion reserved by Lord M'Laren as to the rate of interest chargeable where the right of legitim can be immediately determined, but where the claim is allowed to lie over without fault on either side.

INTEREST—Continued.

Observed by Lord M'Laren,—"There is at present no statutory rate of legal interest; 5 per cent was only a maximum rate, and there is no statutory rule obliging the Court to award 5 per cent in perpetuity. It may not be beyond the powers of the Court to reduce the rate usually awarded in case of a permanent fall in the rate of interest obtainable in this country." Ross v. Ross, June 16, 1896, p. 802.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. Appointment—Curator Bonis—Insanity—Opposition of alleged incapax—Necessity for inquiry.

1. A petition was presented, along with two certificates by medical men, for the appointment of a curator bonis to a person, on the ground that he was of unsound mind. The alleged incapax lodged answers, in which he denied that he was insane. He further averred that he was a domiciled Englishman, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts. The Lord Ordinary granted the petition without inquiry. On a reclaiming note, held that, having regard to the statements in the answers, the petition should not have been granted without inquiry as to the question of domicile and as to the respondent's insanity. Alston v. Alston, Oct. 19, 1895, p. 16.

Appointment—Executor—Executor-nominate—Confirmation—Danger to estate.

2. Circumstances in which the Court dismissed a petition for confirmation presented by the widow and executrix-nominate of a person deceased and appointed a judicial factor on the estate, in respect that prima facie there was risk of injury to the estate if the administration were left in the hands of the petitioner. Powers—Opening lockfast place—Reparation—Wrongous use of diligence.

4. The wife of a bankrupt brought an action of damages against a person who had been appointed judicial factor upon the sequestrated estate of her husband under section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, averring that the defender, while taking an inventory of the effects in the house tenanted by her husband, had wrongfully and without warrant forced open the door of a room which was locked and examined the effects therein, although informed that the effects in that room belonged entirely to the pursuer. Held that the action was irrelevant. M'Lachlan v. Bell, Nov. 20, 1895, p. 126.

Powers—Trust—Power to make advances out of capital—Discretionary power of trustees.

5. A testator conveyed to certain persons named and to such other persons as should be assumed in terms of law to act in the trust, as trustees for executing the trust, his heritable and moveable estates. He directed his trustees, inter alia, to retain and invest £4000 for behoof of his son D in liferent allenarly and of his issue in fee, and on the death of D without issue to pay the sum to the testator's other sons, subject to the condition that "in case at any time my trustees may in the exercise of their judgment and discretion think it prudent and advisable to pay over" to D "the whole or any part of the principal of the said sum of £4000 as his own absolute property, they shall have, and they are hereby granted full power, authority, and liberty to do so, . . . it being my intention to give to my trustees the same full powers and discretion in giving the said principal sum" to D, "which I myself now possess." A judicial factor who had been appointed in room of the trustees, who had resigned, presented a petition, bearing to be at D's request, for power to invest a portion of the £4000 in the purchase of an annuity in favour of D and his wife, and the survivor of them. The Lord Ordinary refused the petition, on the ground that the trust-deed did not authorise any payment for behoof of D's wife. The judicial factor having reclaimed, and lodged a minute stating that in his opinion the proposed application of the portion of the trust-estate was prudent and advisable, the Court, holding that the proposed investment, being at D's request, was virtually a payment to D himself, granted the prayer of the petition.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Crimes and Offences—Breach of the Peace—Relevancy—Proof—Salvation Army Procession.

1. A member of the Salvation Army was charged under a summary complaint, which set forth that on Sunday afternoon he "did behave in a disorderly manner, and did march along the said street playing on a concertina or other similar instrument, and refuse to desist, and annoy and disturb the lieges, and commit a breach of the peace." The accused was convicted. In an appeal the case stated that the following facts were proved:—The appellant marched at the head of a procession playing on a concertina, there being singing and shouting by members of the procession; the playing of the concertina attracted a crowd of thirty or forty persons, thereby making it difficult for people to pass; this was the cause of annoyance to several persons who were examined as witnesses; the complainer on being asked to desist refused to do so. Held that the complaint was relevant, and that the Magistrates, on the facts proved, were entitled to convict. Whitchurch v. Millar, Oct. 25, 1894, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Crimes and Offences—Fortune-telling—Complaint—Relevancy—Intent to deceive—Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, sec. 4—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 15.

2. A woman was charged in a Police Court with a contravention of the Act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 83, sec. 4, in so far as she did, at a time and place specified, "pretend to tell the fortunes of" a person named, "who was thereby induced to pay to the said accused" the "sum of sixpence." The accused was convicted of the contravention "as libelled," and brought a suspension. The Court quashed the conviction, holding that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it did not set forth that the accused had pretended to tell fortunes with intent to deceive and impose on anyone. Smith v. Neilson, March 18, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 77.

Crimes and Offences—Indecent Exposure—Specification—Relevancy.

3. A person was charged upon a complaint which set forth that "he did . . . on a boat in the River Clyde . . . wilfully, indecently, and in a shameless manner expose his person" to a person designed. The accused was convicted of the "crime charged." In a suspension the Court set aside the conviction on the ground that neither the complaint nor the conviction shewed the facts upon which the charge was rested. Carlin v. Malloch, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 43.

Crimes and offences—Murder—Child Murder—Culpable Homicide—Mental derangement short of insanity—Child-birth.

4. At the trial of a woman upon a charge of murdering her child by choking it immediately after its birth, the presiding Judge (Lord M'Laren) directed the jury that they were entitled to find the panel guilty of culpable homicide, if they were of opinion upon the evidence that her mental state at the time when the injury was inflicted, though not warranting an acquittal on the ground of insanity, was such as to make her only partially accountable for her acts. H. M. Advocate v. Abercrombie, May 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 80.

Crimes and offences—Pharmacy Act, 1868, secs. 1 and 15—Keeping open shop for retailing poisons by unregistered person—Chemist—Photographic Chemist.

5. A dealer in photographic materials was charged with an offence under the Pharmacy Act, 1868, sec. 1, in so far as he, not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist, did at his shop unlawfully "keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons." The following facts were proved:—That the accused had not the statutory qualification; that he had a shop open to the public for the sale of photographic materials, including some of the scheduled poisons; that his assistants were instructed to sell poisons only to persons engaged in photography or to chemists; that his trade catalogue bore that the scheduled poisons were only to be sold in wholesale quantities, but specified prices per ounce and per lb.; that an assistant in the shop on one occasion sold one ounce of one of the scheduled poisons. In an appeal upon a case stated held that the facts stated amounted to the offence of keeping open shop for the retailing of poisons. Bremridge v. Turnbull, Nov. 2, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 12.

6. Held that the use of the title "scientific instrument maker and technical chemist" by a person who had not the statutory qualification was a contravention of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, sec. 1. Bremridge v. Hume, Nov. 2, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 9.

Crimes and offences—Theft—Reset—Conviction of reset on a charge of theft—Specification—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 59.

7. A person was tried before a Sheriff and a jury on an indictment which set forth that the accused did, "between 6th and 12th October 1895, from a field or fields on the farm of Marchhill, in the parish and county of Dumfries, belonging to John Blackley, cattle-dealer, residing there, steal" three sheep. The jury returned this verdict,—"Find the accused guilty of reset of theft." In a suspension, held that the conviction was not bad for want of specification. Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate, Jan. 8, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 28.

In 1892 the Fishery Board issued a bye-law prohibiting beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the limits specified, and setting forth that any person acting in contravention of the bye-law should be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for a first offence, and not exceeding £20 for a second or any subsequent offence. The Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, sec. 10, repealed sec. 7, subsec. 2, of the Act of 1889, and substituted for the penalties there provided a fine not exceeding £100, and failing payment imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days. A person was convicted of a contravention of the bye-law on a complaint which set forth that the accused was liable in a penalty not exceeding £100, and failing payment to imprisonment, and prayed for the imposition of the penalties provided by the Act of 1895. Held, in a suspension, that whether the penalty ought to have been specified in the bye-law or not, as it was in fact specified, and as the complaint was founded on the bye-law, the conviction fell to be quashed, as the penalty prayed for was in excess of that specified in the bye-law. Green v. Leith, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 50.

9. Held (over-ruling Green v. Leith, supra, No. 8) (1) that the portion of the bye-law relating to penalties ought not to have been included in the bye-law, and was to be regarded as nothing more than a superfluous intimation by the Fishery Board of the statutory penalties incurred by a contravention of the bye-law at the date when the bye-law was framed; (2) that the bye-law, in so far as it prohibited beam-trawling or otter-trawling within the line from Duncansby Head to Rattray Point, remained in force notwithstanding the passing of the Act of 1895; and (3) that after the passing of the Act of 1895 the penalties incurred on conviction of a contravention of the bye-law were those specified in that Act, and not those specified in the Act of 1889. Therefore (1) where a complaint set forth that the accused was liable to a penalty not exceeding £100, and, failing payment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days, and prayed for the imposition of the penalty provided by the Act of 1895, held that the complaint was well laid; but (2) where a complaint set forth that the accused had incurred a penalty not exceeding £5, and prayed for the imposition of the penalty provided by the bye-law and by the Acts of 1889 and 1895, held that the complaint was incompetent. Wilson v. Rust; Wilson v. Mackenzie, Feb. 29, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 56.

Complaint—Specification—Statutory offence—Reference to section of statute.

10. A complaint charging a statutory offence must specify the section or sections of the statute constituting the offence, except in cases where the statute is so brief as to render such specification unnecessary.

A complaint charged the accused with an offence "contrary to the Public-Houses (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Acts 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 67, therein referred to." Held that the complaint was irrelevant for want of specification. Buchanan v. Wilson, July 16, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 86.

Procedure—Inducie—Home Drummond Act, 1828, sec. 23—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 6—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 515.

11. Held that a complaint of breach of a publican's certificate brought under the Summary Procedure Act and the Burgh Police Act, 1892, must be served upon an inducie of six days in terms of the Home Drummond Act, 1828. Laird v. Anderson, Nov. 2, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 14.

Procedure—Illegal Citation—Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 477.

12. Where a person cited under the Burgh Police Act, 1892, upon an inducie of three days to answer to a complaint which required an inducie of six days, appeared and pleaded that she had not been duly cited, and was afterwards convicted, held that the citation being invalid the subsequent proceedings were inept. Laird v. Anderson, Nov. 2, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 14.

Procedure—Verbal Citation—Person with known address—Oppression.

13. Observed per cur. that when a person charged with a police offence has a known place of residence, it is oppressive to bring him before a magistrate without serving upon him a copy of the complaint (unless he is apprehended in flagrante delicto). Carlin v. Malloch, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 43.

Procedure—Irregularity—Interlocutor adjourning diet unsigned—Exclusion of review—Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 495.

14. The record of the proceedings under a complaint charging an offence under the Burgh Police Act, shewed that the magistrates made several adjournments of the diet, and the magistrates omitted to sign the interlocutor making the final adjournment until after the trial and conviction of the accused. Held that this omission rendered the trial and the conviction irregular and illegal, and that the conviction fell to be quashed, notwithstanding the provision of sec. 495 of the Burgh Police Act. MacArthur v. Campbell, March 18, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 81.

Oppressive Prosecution—Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 180.

15. A person erected a house in a burgh, and let it to a tenant on the condition that he should not enter into occupation until it was finished. During the absence of the landlord the tenant occupied the house without any notice having been given under section 180 of the Burgh Police Act. On the landlord's return he at once gave notice to the town-clerk that the house was ready for inspection. A prosecution was instituted against him for failure to give notice before the house was occupied, and he was convicted and sentenced to a fine of 10s. Opinion per Lord Young, that the prosecution was nimious and oppressive in the circumstances, and that the conviction should be set aside. MacArthur v. Campbell, March 18, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 81.

Proof.

16. At the trial of a butcher before a Sheriff and a jury for reset of theft of sheep, the agent for the accused proposed to prove that the man who had stolen the sheep libelled had sold other stolen sheep to other butchers who had bought in bona fide ignorance that the sheep had been stolen. In a suspension held that the Sheriff had rightly disallowed this line of evidence. Kennedy v. H. M. Advocate, Jan. 8, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 28.

17. The record of the proceedings in a Police Court prosecution set forth that Bridget Macdonald had appeared and given evidence for the prosecution. In a suspension it appeared that the witness examined was not Bridget Macdonald; that she knew nothing at first hand of the facts to which she had spoken; and that she had been told what to say. Held that the conviction fell to be quashed in respect that the record set forth the name of a witness who had not been examined, and failed to set forth the name of a witness who had been examined. Gachie v. Auld, July 16, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 87.

Conviction—Verdict—Alternative charge and general conviction—Post-Office offence—Stealing or secreting letters—Post-Office Offences Acts Consolidation Act, 1837, sec. 26.

18. Held that the alternative statements in the Post-Office Offences Act, 1837, were not statements of proper alternative offences, but were only specifications of different modes in which the statutory offence might be committed, and therefore that a general verdict of guilty as libelled on an indictment setting forth that the accused did "steal or secrete a post letter," contrary to the Act, was a good verdict. Teesdale v. H. M. Advocate, March 17, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 73.

Conviction—Several charge and general conviction—Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850, sec. 1.

19. A complaint set forth that A, a carriage-hirer, and B his servant, did

"cruelly beat, illtreat, overdrive, . . . or procure to be cruelly beaten, illtreated, overdriven," two horses belonging to A, then under charge of B, and did cause the said animals to draw a brake laden with passengers, and the said B did unmercifully and unnecessarily lash them with the shaft of a whip, said animals being in a poor, weak, and emaciated condition, and completely exhausted, whereby said animals were subjected to pain and suffering, contrary to the Act 13 and 14 Victoria, caput 92, section 1." The Justices found A and B "guilty of the contravention charged," and convicted them. In a suspension by the master held that the conviction against him was bad, on the ground that as one of the acts charged as together constituting the contravention was attributed to the servant alone, the general conviction against the master was not valid. Galbraith v. Disselduff, Oct. 25, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 4.

Sentence—Separation of competent portion of sentence from incompetent—Warrant to recover penalty by poinding—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, secs. 18 and 25.

20. A conviction and sentence of a contravention of the Vaccination Act, 1863, sentenced the accused to payment of a fine and expenses, and continued,—"And in default of immediate payment thereof, grants warrant for recovery of the said sums by poinding of his goods and effects, and summary sale thereof on the expiration of not less than forty-eight hours after such poinding, without further notice or warrant, and appoints a return or execution of such poinding and sale to be made within eight days from this date, under certification of imprisonment for the period of ten days in default of payment or recovery of the said sums, with the expenses of diligence, before the time allowed for such report." In a suspension the prosecutor admitted that the warrant for poinding was ultra vires, but maintained that, quoad ultra, the sentence was valid and ought to be upheld. The Court suspended the conviction simpliciter, holding that it was impossible to separate the warrant to poind from the remainder of the sentence so as to leave a sentence which was valid in terms of the Act. Moffat v. Shaw, Jan. 8, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 18.

Sentence—Conviction—Expenses—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, Schedule K, Form 3.

21. A conviction and sentence in the form of Schedule K, No. 3, of the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, suspended, on the ground that it adjudged the accused, in default of immediate payment of the penalty imposed, to be imprisoned for fourteen days, "unless the said penalty and expenses shall be sooner paid," while no award of expenses had been pronounced against the accused. Dingwall v. Davidson, Jan. 9, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 31.

Appeal—Case stated—Competency—Time—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, sec. 3.

22. Applications under section 3 of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, to the inferior Judge to state a case for appeal, must be made within the three days provided by that section, even where the last of the three days is a Sunday. M'Vean v. Jameson, Jan. 8, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 25.

LEASE. Constitution—Lease by bona fide possessor without title—Assignation.

1. The title of a bona fide possessor of land, who had granted a lease of minerals for twelve years, was reduced when 3½ years of the lease had still to run. He then granted an assignation of the lease in favour of the true owner, who undertook to implement the granter's obligations.

LEASE—Continued.

In an action by the lessee against the granter and the assignee for declarator that the pursuer was not bound by the lease, held that the lease was not binding on the true owner when he established his right to the lands, and therefore that it was not binding on the tenant, and that the assignation had no effect, as the granter had nothing to assign, diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion (1) that, as the lease had been granted by a bona fide possessor in the course of ordinary administration, it was binding upon the true owner, and (2) that if the lease was not binding upon him originally he was entitled to validate it by homologation, and had done so. Reid's Trustee v. Watson's Trustees, March 13, 1896, p. 636.

Construction—River—Lease of water in ponds and "streams leading thereto"—Whether water percolating to pond from spring a "stream."

2. Under the lease of a distillery the tenant had right to the water in two ponds, "and in the streams leading thereto." A stream from the hills entered the upper pond, which was connected with the lower pond by another stream. A few yards from the lower pond was a spring, water from which percolated through marshy ground into that pond. After the date of the lease the landlord collected the water from the spring into a tank, and by means of a pipe carried part of this water to the house of another of his tenants, the remainder of the water collected in the tank passing through an overflow pipe into the pond. The tenant of the distillery having brought an action to have the landlord interdicted from interfering with the water from the spring, held after a proof that the tenant was not entitled to interdict, per the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner, on the ground that water percolating from a spring to a pond did not constitute a stream in the sense of the lease, and per Lord Young on the ground that in the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence the tenant had not suffered any prejudice from the landlord's operations. M'Nab v. Campbell's Trustees, July 17, 1896, p. 1098.

Passive Title—Heir—Lease excluding assignees.

3. A nineteen years' lease of an urban subject was granted to a tenant and his heirs, but excluding assignees and subtenants without the consent of the lessor. On the death of the tenant, his heir took up the lease. Held that the heir did not incur passive representation for the debts of his predecessor, in respect that he took the lease, not as representing his ancestor, but in his own right under the lease. Bain v. Mackenzie, Feb. 25, 1896, p. 528.

Long Lease—Fee and Liferent—Husband and Wife—Assignation of lease—Destination to spouses in conjunct fee and to the survivor in fee.

4. A lease for ninety-nine years was assigned to spouses "in conjunct fee and to the survivor of them in fee." Held that the fee vested in the spouses jointly, with the benefit of survivorship. Walker v. Galbraith, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 347.

Long Lease—Destination—Vesting—Succession—Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

5. Certain subjects were leased for 950 years to A. P., "and his heirs as after mentioned," and failing him "then the whole subjects to and in liferent only to the present wife of the said A. P. . . . and after the death of the said spouses . . . then to the children of their marriage equally between them, share and share alike, in fee." A. P. was survived by his wife. Three children of their marriage were alive at the date of the lease, of whom two survived their father. Held in a competition as to the right to the lease on the death of the widow, that the right to the lease, subject to the widow's liferent, had vested on the death of the father in the two children then alive to the extent of one half each, and that a daughter of the third child who had predeceased that date had no right, as the conditio si sine liberis did not apply, the lease having been granted by a stranger to the family, and not as a parental provision. Marquis v. Prentice, March 12, 1896, p. 595.

Long Lease—Right in Security—Poinding of the ground—Registered bond and assignation in security of long lease—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 4.

6. Held that the creditor under a bond and assignation of a ninety-nine years' lease duly recorded in terms of the Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 4, was not entitled to warrant for poinding of the ground. Luke v. Wallace, March 13, 1896, p. 634.

Compulsory Sale—Compensation to tenant—Lease with break.

7. A tenant of a farm under a lease to Whitsunday 1911, which gave power to the landlord or tenant to terminate it at Whitsunday 1898, being deprived of land by a Local Authority under compulsory powers, claimed, in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, compensation for loss of profits on the basis of the lease extending to Whitsunday 1911. The Local Authority contended that the lease should be taken as ending at Whitsunday 1898. Held that the tenant was entitled to compensation on the footing that the lease endured to Whitsunday 1911, subject to such deduction as the arbiter might consider due to the contingency of its being brought to an end at an earlier date. Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, Nov. 15, 1895, p. 98.

Compulsory Sale—Railway—Construction of railway—Compensation—Yearly tenant—Procedure—Arbitration—Sheriff—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 6—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 114.

8. A claim by a yearly tenant against a railway company for compensation under sec. 6 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, falls to be determined by the Sheriff under sec. 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845—and not by arbitration—whether the claim is on account of lands injuriously affected or is on account of lands taken. Glasgow District Subway Co. v. Albin & Sons, Nov. 6, 1895, p. 81.

Outgoing and Incoming—Compensation—Tenant's claim for arbiter's valuation—Counter claim by landlord under the lease—Liquid and illiquid.

9. In an action by an outgoing tenant against his landlord for sums ascertained to be due to the pursuer under his lease by arbiters mutually chosen, the defender pleaded that he was entitled to set off against the pursuer's claim a counter claim for interest on improvement expenditure, &c. under the lease. Held that as the pursuer's right depended on his having implemented his obligations under the lease he was not entitled to decree de plano, and a proof allowed. Lovie v. Baird's Trustees, Oct. 16, 1895, p. 1.

Outgoing and Incoming—Compensation—Claim by tenant under a separate contract—Counter claim by landlord under the lease—Liquid and illiquid.

10. In an action by an outgoing tenant against his landlord for the price of the waygoing crop, which had been ascertained, as provided for by the lease, in a submission entered into between the parties at its termination, the defender, who had taken over the crop and admitted that the price was due, pleaded that he was entitled to set off against the pursuer's claim an illiquid counter claim under the lease for damages against the tenant for miscropping and for failing to upkeep buildings. Held that the landlord's illiquid counter claim under the lease was not a relevant defence to the tenant's claim for the sum found due to him by the decreet-arbitral. Sutherland v. Urquhart, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 284.

LEASE—Continued.

Compensation for improvements—Notice—Determination of tenancy—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, sec. 7.

11. A farm was let for a term of years "with entry at Martinmas 1885," subject to the condition that the tenant should only get possession of the threshing-mill "after the landlord shall have done with using the same in threshing out last year's crop." The conditions of lease provided that no turnips growing on the farm should be sold, but that the whole should be consumed and made down into dung and regularly applied to the lands. It was further provided that the tenant should have right to the barn, threshing-mill, and barnyard, till the "term of Whitsunday, after the termination of the lease, for the purpose of stacking and threshing his waygoing crop. Held that "the determination of the tenancy" was at Martinmas, although the tenant was entitled under the lease to remain in occupation of the land under turnips, and to a limited use of the barnyard and threshing-mill after that date, and that notice of a claim for compensation fell to be given by the tenant four months before Martinmas. Waldie v. Mungall, June 16, 1896, p. 792.

Desertion of farm—Appointment of manager—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Judicial Factor—Reduction.

12. Where a tenant has deserted a farm without making proper provision for its management, it is competent for the Sheriff, on the petition of the landlord, to appoint an interim manager.

A landlord, on 31st August 1894, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for the appointment of a manager upon a farm, alleging that the tenant had almost entirely displenished the farm, had left it without appointing any manager, and was believed to have gone to America without the intention of returning. No appearance was entered for the tenant, who had left for America on 24th August, and the Sheriff, without inquiry, made the appointment craved, and by an interlocutor dated 10th October, pronounced a fortnight after the tenant had returned to his farm, approved the manager's report of his management, and granted him a discharge. Thereafter the tenant raised an action against the landlord concluding for reduction of the decree appointing the manager, and of the subsequent interlocutors, on the ground that the application to the Sheriff was incompetent, and that, in any view, the Sheriff was not entitled to grant the petition without making inquiry. He averred that he had not deserted the farm, but had been merely temporarily absent from it. He made no claim for damages in the action, and did not aver that he had suffered pecuniary loss by the defender's proceedings. He stated, however, that he reserved his claim for damages in respect thereof. After a proof the Court assoilzied the defender, holding that in the absence of any claim for damages the only ground of action which fell to be considered was the competency of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court, and that as it had been proved that the landlord had reasonable grounds for believing that the tenant had deserted his farm without making any proper provision for its management, these proceedings were competent. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

LIEN. Minute-book of Company.

Held that a person who had been secretary of a company prior to its liquidation had no right of retention or lien over its minute-book for a debt due to him by the company. Gladstone v. M'Callum, June 16, 1896, p. 783.

LOAN. Right in Security—Agreement for repayments out of profits—Specific appropriation—Breach of trust.

1. A offered to advance to a shipping company £15,000 on a mortgage over a steam vessel, "on condition that all profits earned by the steamer to be paid to us towards reducing the loan till the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000." The managing committee of the company agreed to accept the offer, subject to the modification "that instead of all the profits being paid to A till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then." A agreed to the modification, and the arrangement was approved by the company. Subsequently the advance was made, and the mortgage granted. The company went into liquidation. Held that the agreement imported merely a personal obligation by the company to pay to A £2000 per annum from profits, and that A had no preference over the profits. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel, Nov. 7, 1895, p. 84.

Proof—Bank Cheque.

2. In support of a claim against the estate of a deceased person for repayment of an alleged loan, the creditor produced a cheque drawn by her payable to the deceased or bearer, and marked paid by the bank, but not indorsed by any payee. Held that the cheque did not of itself instruct a loan, and afforded no ground for allowing parole proof. Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy, March 12, 1896, p. 621.

Proof—Writ—Writ of executor and trustee—Writ of beneficiaries—Res inter alios.

3. In an action of multiplepoinding brought by a testamentary trustee, a claim was lodged by A, who averred that "from time to time she made loans of money" to the truster amounting in all to £390. In support of her claim A referred to a minute of agreement entered into between the truster's widow, since deceased, who was at the time his executrix and sole trustee, and his eldest son, under which the son took over at a valuation the crop and stocking on certain farms of which the truster had been tenant. There was appended to the minute, which was tested, a state of the trust funds, and among the "outstanding debts" was entered "sum on debt due to" A "£390." The state was signed by the widow and eldest son, and appended to it was a docquet signed by the truster's other children, who, with the widow and eldest son, were the beneficiaries under his will, approving of the minute of agreement, and also "approving of and holding as correct, and duly vouched" the state of trust funds. A, to whom the document had not been delivered or exhibited at any time, maintained that the debt of £390 was proved by it, or alternatively that it raised a prima facie case of loan which she was entitled to supplement by parole proof. Held (1) that the docquet was not a writ binding on the beneficiaries as in a question with A, but was merely an admission or discharge by them in favour of the truster's widow; (2) that the entry of the sum of £390 was ineffectual to prove a debt due by the trust-estate, in respect (a) that the writ in which it occurred was not delivered to A as an acknowledgment by the trustee that the debt was due, and (b) that such an acknowledgment, if delivered to A, would not have been binding on the trust-estate; and (3) that the writs being themselves insufficient to prove the constitution of a loan there was no room for parole proof to any effect. Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy, March 12, 1896, p. 621.

Proof—Writ—Writ of executor.

4. Held that an affidavit in support of a claim for return of inventory-duty in which an executor deponed that he had actually paid debts "due and owing from the deceased at the time of his death," including a debt due to A, was not evidence of the constitution of a debt due to A. Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy, March 12, 1896, p. 621.

MAILLS AND DUTIES. Superior and Vassal—Right in Security.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Vesting—Entail—Provision by heir of entail for younger children.
1. C, an heir of entail in possession, by his marriage-contract, in the exercise of a power under the deed of entail, bound the succeeding heirs to pay to the trustees a sum equal to three years' rent of the entailed estate, in trust for behoof of the children of the marriage not succeeding to the entailed estate, in such shares as C should appoint, and failing appointment, to be held by the trustees for the younger children alive at C's death equally, or their issue. As a further provision for his younger children, he assigned to his trustees certain policies of assurance on his life under similar conditions as to apportionment. In contemplation of the marriage of R, his third son, C executed a deed appointing to R or his lawful issue or assigns £1500 as his share of the total trust funds. This deed was declared to be delivered on execution, and to be irrevocable, and R was taken bound to assign his rights under it to his marriage-contract trustees. R predeceased his father. Held that R's right to the £1500 was not contingent on his surviving his father, and that it vested at the date of the appointment in his favour. Chancellor's Trustees v. Sharples' Trustees, Jan. 24, 1896, p. 435.

Vesting—Clause of survivorship—Power of appointment.
2. By antenuptial marriage-contract A bound himself "to make payment to the child or children that may happen to be procreate of this marriage of" £8000 "to be payable at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the longest liver of him" and his intended spouse, "which sum in the event of there being more children than one shall be divisible in such proportions as A shall appoint, by a writing under his hand at any time of his life, and failing such appointment, to be divided equally amongst the survivors of them and the issue of such as may have predeceased leaving issue, such issue succeeding always only to the shares to which their parents would have been entitled had they been in life." Thirty years after his marriage A executed a deed apportioning the fund among his children then alive (there being no issue of predeceasers) as follows,—to his son B, "whom failing, by his predeceasing the term of payment, his issue," a certain sum and the remainder equally among his other children C, D, and E, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the issue of such as may have predeceased the term of payment leaving issue." A was survived by his widow and by these children. In a special case presented during the lifetime of A's widow by the representative of one of the children who had survived A and had died without issue, and by the surviving children, held (1) that under the marriage-contract the right to the sum payable by A's executors at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the surviving spouse did not vest in the children prior to that date; and (2) that the apportionment was valid. Blackburn's Trustees v. Blackburn, March 20, 1896, p. 698.

Fee and Liferent—Assignation of lease—Destination to spouses in conjunct fee and to the survivor in fee.

3. A lease for ninety-nine years was assigned to spouses "in conjunct fee and to the survivor of them in fee." Held that the fee vested in the spouses jointly, with the benefit of survivorship. Walker v. Galbraith, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 347.

Special Destination—General Settlement.

4. A long lease of heritage was assigned to D. D. and M. D., his wife, "in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee, and at the death of the survivor to the heirs of the said D. D. and M. D., equally between them." The spouses subsequently executed a mutual settlement, by which they conveyed to the survivor of them in liferent for his or her liferent use only, and at the death of the survivor to two sons of the wife by a former marriage, their whole heritable and moveable estate. At the date of the mutual settlement the spouses had no other property than the lease carried by the assignation. Held that the destination in the assignation to the heirs of the spouses was evacuated by the mutual settlement. Walker v. Galbraith, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 347.

Power to revoke—Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, sec. 16—Reasonable provision for wife.

5. Spouses who had invested a legacy of £1000, received by the wife from a relative, in their joint names, executed the following deed,—"We . . . in order to regulate the succession to our heritable and moveable estates after our deaths, have resolved to grant these presents . . . We . . . do hereby leave and bequeath, assign and dispone to the last survivor of us in liferent for his or her liferent use allenarly, whom failing, to our son in fee," certain of the investments, declaring that in the event of the son dying before the surviving spouse without leaving issue and intestate, the shares and moneys should be divided equally, one share to be divided among the children of the husband's brother, and the other share to be paid to the wife's brother. The residue of the estates of the two spouses was bequeathed to the surviving spouse, and "in so far as these presents relate to the shares . . . and moneys to be liferented by the survivor of us are concerned, we hereby mutually declare the same to be irrevocable unless with our joint consent." The husband survived, and the son died during his survivance without issue and intestate. In an action brought by the wife's brother against the husband for declarator that he had an indefeasible right under the mutual deed, and that the husband was not entitled to revoke it to the pursuer's prejudice, held that the deed was contractual, and, in the sense of section 16 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act of 1861, a reasonable provision by the husband for the support of the wife, and was not revocable by the husband. Mudie v. Clough, July 17, 1896, p. 1074.

Satisfaction.

6. Legacy which was held not to be in satisfaction of marriage-contract provision. Johnstone v. Haviland, Feb. 17, 1896, H. L., p. 6.

Denuding—Annuity to wife—Power to discharge stante matrimonio—Purchase of annuity in lieu of that provided in marriage-contract.

7. By antenuptial contract dated in 1866, the father of the intended husband bound himself to pay £40,000 to the marriage-contract trustees for the purpose, inter alia, of payment to the wife, in the event of her surviving her husband, of a free yearly annuity of £800 during her lifetime. This annuity was not declared to be alimentary. In 1895 the spouses and the children of the marriage (who were sui juris) called on the trustees to denude of the £40,000, alleging that the whole fund had vested in the children absolutely, subject to the annuity contingently provided to the wife, and that she had agreed to discharge that annuity. Held that the trustees were not entitled to denude of the £40,000, in respect that the annuity was a marriage-contract provision which the wife was not entitled stante matrimonio either to alienate or to discharge.

Held, further, that the trustees were not entitled to purchase with the trust funds an annuity in their names, payable to the wife contingently on her surviving her husband, and, quoad ultra, to denude of the trust funds, in respect (1) that the security of the trust funds was greater than that of a purchased annuity, and (2) that a purchased annuity, not being protected by the marriage-contract trust, could be alienated by the wife. Ker's Trustees v. Ker, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 317.

MINES AND MINERALS. Entail—Restriction of provisions to Widow and Children—5 Geo. IV. c. 87 (Aberdeen Act), secs. 1 and 4—Free yearly rent—Mineral Lease—Royalties—Approaching exhaustion of minerals.
1. Held by a majority of seven Judges that in estimating the provisions which an heir of entail is entitled under sections 1 and 4 of the Aberdeen Act to make for his widow and children, the royalties payable under mineral leases during the year current at the date of the granter's death fall to be taken as part of the "free yearly rent" of the entailed estate, irrespective of the fact that the minerals are nearly exhausted. Lord Belhaven and Stenton, Jan. 23, 1896, p. 423.

Lease—Construction.
2. A proprietor let to a tenant the coal under certain lands described, with the sole right of working and winning "the whole or any part of said coal" for the period of 171 years, but with power to the tenant to renounce the lease in certain events, and, inter alia, so soon as that part of the coal was worked out which lay above what was known as the day level. On his part the tenant bound himself to pay to the landlord, "as long as the workings are confined to that part of the coal which is above" the day level, a fixed rent of £200, or in the option of the landlord one-seventh of the gross produce of the coal. He also bound himself to proportion the working of the splint seam "as nearly as possible" to the other seams in the same manner as was observed in other well-regulated collieries. It was further agreed that in case the tenant, his heirs and successors, "shall not avail themselves of the break stipulated for in this lease when that part of the coal is worked out which lies above" the day level, "but shall declare their intention of proceeding to work out the remainder of the coal, . . . then and in that event, and so soon as the said coal lying above the said level shall be completely worked out . . . the rent and proportion hereinbefore specified . . . shall thencefurth cease and determine," and the tenant and his foresaids "shall in lieu thereof" be bound to pay a fixed rent of £150, or in the option of the landlord one-tenth of the gross produce of the coal, "the said restricted rent to commence either upon the day in which the sale of the coal under the foresaid level commences, or at the expiry of two years from the day upon which the former rent ceases, whichever of these events shall first happen." In an action raised by the landlord for declarator that the tenant was not entitled to work the coal below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted, the tenant maintained that, as no restriction was expressed in the lease, no restriction was to be implied. Held that the tenant was not entitled to work coal below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted. Carron Company v. Henderson's Trustees, July 15, 1896, p. 1042.

Lease—Agreement to alter—Proof—Acquiescence in contravention of lease—Personal Bar.

3. By the provisions of the lease of a coal-field granted in 1798 for a period of 171 years, the tenant and his successors were not entitled to work the coal below what was known as the "day level" until the coal above that level was exhausted. In 1828 it was found that the most valuable seam in the field was practically worked out above the day level, and the tenant, with the approval of the landlord, began to work below that level. After that date, with occasional intervals, the tenant and his successors continued, with the knowledge and tacit consent of the landlord, to work coal below the day level, although the upper seams of coal were unexhausted, and with the view to such working they drove mines to the lower seams. In an action raised by the landlord in 1895, for declarator that the tenant was not entitled to work coal below the day level until the coal above that level was exhausted, and for interdict, held that the landlord's consent to the tenant's deviation from the lease in the past did not imply an agreement to alter the terms of the lease, and that the landlord had done nothing to bar himself from demanding their observance in the future. Carron Company v. Henderson's Trustees, July 15, 1896, p. 1042.

Railway—Compulsory Powers—Misappropriation of freestone—Reparation—Measure of damages.

4. A railway company having wrongously excavated certain freestone reserved to their superiors, held that the superiors were entitled to recover from the company the market value of the freestone used or removed by them, less the cost of working, although it appeared that the superiors could not themselves have worked or let the freestone to a profit. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 29, 1895, p. 45.

Superior and Vassal—Feuar's right to freestone for building on feu—Whether railway bridges and other works within right.

5. A feu-charter, which reserved the freestone to the superior, gave power to the feuar, notwithstanding the reservation, to dig or work the freestone for erecting "houses and offices, or walls or other buildings" upon the feu, or for making or repairing the roads thereon. A railway company having taken over the feu by compulsory purchase, held that it was within the powers of the feuar to dig freestone for the construction of bridges and other railway works on the feu. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 29, 1895, p. 45.

Superior and Vassal—Feu with minerals reserved to granter—Lease of minerals—Damage caused to feu by working of minerals—Action by feuar against granter—Process—"All parties not called."

6. A granted a feu of certain subjects, reserving the minerals, and afterwards leased the minerals. Injury having subsequently been occasioned to the surface of the feu by the workings of the mineral tenants, the feuar raised an action of damages against A. The defender, averring that the injury was due solely to the fault of the mineral tenants, pleaded, "All parties not called." Held that the pursuer was entitled to proceed with his action without calling the mineral tenants. Highgate & Co. v. Magistrates of Paisley, July 9, 1896, p. 992.

Superior and Vassal—Reservation in feu-charter—Power to "search for and work out" coal—"Shank or open the ground"—"Close or garden."

7. A feu-charter, dated in 1728, contained a reservation in the granter's favour of the coal under the subjects feued, with power "to search for, work out, and dispose of the said coal, . . . and provided that, in searching for or working said coal, we doe not shank or open the ground within the house, office-houses, closs, or gardens to be built or made upon the said landa." In 1895 a successor of the granter commenced boring operations at a spot which was within thirteen yards of one of the main entrances of the mansion-house built upon the feu, and which was situated in an artificially made and enclosed piece of ground laid out partly in grass and partly in flower beds. The bore was sunk in the part laid out in grass. In a note of suspension and interdict presented by the feuar to have the boring operations interdicted, held (1) that "boring" was covered by the expression "opening the ground"; and (2) that the place where the operations were being carried on was a "close or garden" in the sense of the charter, and was therefore within the prohibited area. Macdonald v. Welsh, July 9, 1896, p. 995.

Valuation Acts—Subjects—Erections by lessee—Clayfield—"Minerals"—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, sec. 4, Exemption 2.

8. A tenant who under his lease had right to dig and take clay to a considerable depth below the surface made certain erections upon the ground let to him, which he used exclusively for the purpose of working the clay. Held that "clay" was a "mineral" within the meaning of exemption 2 of section 4 of the Lands Valuation Amendment Act, 1895. Assessor for Portobello v. Mitchell & Sons, March 20, 1896, p. 686.

MINOR AND PUPIL. Allowance for heir's maintenance and education.

1. Circumstances in which a mother, who had for ten years as her son's tutor and curator managed large entailed estates and kept up the family residence for her own and his behoof at a cost of £3000 per annum, and expended upwards of £1000 per annum in his maintenance and education and his travelling and other expenses, was held (varying judgment of the First Division) entitled in a question with her son to take credit for an annual charge at the rate of £3000 for his maintenance and education, in the sense of fitting him for his future position in life. Ross v. Ross, July 27, 1896, H. L., p. 67.

Removal of Tutor and Curator.

2. A petition at the instance of one of two testamentary trustees and executors, who were also tutors to the truster's pupil children, for the removal of the other trustee from these offices on the ground that his estates had been sequestrated, and that the trust had a claim against his estate, granted. Whittle v. Carruthers, June 2, 1896, p. 774.

Custody and religious education of pupil orphans—Guardian—Mora—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, secs. 2 and 3.

3. In April 1893, the mother of three pupil children, a year after her husband's death, and a month before her own, sent them to the manager of a Protestant Home in this country, with a view to their being sent to Canada, or kept in this country, as the manager should consider best. Two of the children were sent to a similar Home in Canada in March 1894, and all were well cared for and brought up as Protestants. In October 1895 the grandfather and an uncle of the children, who were their nearest male agnates, presented a petition craving the Court to deliver the children to them, or otherwise to ordain the manager of the Homes to bring up and educate the children as Roman Catholics. They averred that the parents of the children were Roman Catholics, and that they had both expressed the desire that their children should be brought up in that religion. The Court refused the petition in respect that the children had been sent to the Homes by their mother, who was their legal guardian, and that it would not be for the benefit of the children to disturb the arrangements made for their upbringing and religion, seeing that these had endured for three years. Kincaid v. Quarrier, March 19, 1896, p. 676.

Custody and aliment of children—Husband and Wife—Divorce—Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861, sec. 9.

4. An order pronounced by a Lord Ordinary in an action of divorce, under the power conferred by section 9 of the Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, to make provision for the custody and aliment of pupil children of the marriage, ceases to be operative in regard to each child when it emerges from pupillarity. Watson v. Watson, Nov. 28, 1895, p. 219.

Illegitimate Child—Aliment—Custody—Father's offer to receive and support male child of seven years—Religion of Child.

5. The rule that the father of an illegitimate male child seven years of age is entitled to be relieved of the burden of alimenting it in its mother's custody if he offer to support it in his own home will not be applied when it appears that it would be detrimental to the welfare of the child to remove it from the mother's custody.

Question whether such an offer by a Roman Catholic father, who declares his intention to bring up the child in his own faith, will relieve him of the obligation to aliment the child if the Protestant mother chooses to retain the custody of the child, and states that she wishes the child to be brought up as a Protestant. A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. The town-council, which was the Local Authority, approved of these operations. In a suspension and interdict brought by an inhabitant to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, held that as the Local Authority were entrusted with the duty of seeing that the streets were cleared in such emergencies as a heavy snowstorm, and as they approved of the methods employed by the tramway company, the note of suspension and interdict fell to be refused. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., Dec. 20, 1895, p. 340.

PARENT AND CHILD. Filiation—General averment in defence that pursuer had intercourse with other men—Allowance of proof of averments generally—Competency of specific questions as to such intercourse.

1. In defence to an action of filiation and aliment relating to an illegitimate child born in December 1895, the defender denied the paternity, and averred "that about 1894 and 1895 the pursuer was indulging in sexual intercourse with several young men living in her own neighbourhood, among them being 'three men named,' and that one of them is the father of the child." The parties were allowed a proof "of their respective averments on record." Held that, whether the averment quoted was irrelevant for want of specification or not, as the defender had been allowed a proof of his averments, he was entitled at the proof to ask the men named in his averment whether they had had intercourse with the pursuer on particular occasions in the period specified. Barr v. Bain, July 17, 1896, p. 1090.

Illegitimate Child—Filiation—Proof—Effect of defender's false denial of material circumstances.

2. Evidence in an action of filiation which was held sufficient to establish that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child.

Observed that the denial by the defender in an action of filiation of material facts and circumstances (although not believed) does not corroborate the pursuer's statement, but that if the pursuer is corroborated as to material statements made by her, and as to which she is contradicted by the defender, the defender's denial, if proved false or not credited, may give a complexion to the whole evidence adverse to him. PARISH COUNCIL. Chairman of Parochial Board ex officio trustee—Parish Council succeeding to Parochial Board—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, secs. 21 and 22.

A truster in 1885 nominated among her trustees "the chairman of the Parochial Board of the parish of K. and his successor in office for the time being, so long as such board shall exist." Held that the chairman of the Parish Council of K. was not entitled ex officio to act as a trustee under the deed. Bankruptcy—Title to Sue—Sequestration of firm—Title of trustee to sue solvent partner for payment of debts due to firm's creditors.

2. Question whether the trustee on the estate of a firm which has been sequestrated has a title to sue a solvent partner for payment of the debts due by him as a partner to the creditors of the firm. Laing Brothers & Co.'s Trustee v. Low, July 17, 1896, p. 1105.

Stamp—Conveyance on sale—Transfer of assets of private partnership to public company—Identity of partners and shareholders—Consideration—Company—Stamp Act, 1891, secs. 54 and 55—First Schedule.

3. Where a private partnership conveyed its whole assets to a joint stock company limited by shares, consisting exclusively of the same partners, in consideration of each partner getting shares in the new company equal in value to his holding in the old partnership, held that the conveyance was a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that the disposition was chargeable with ad valorem stamp-duty on the value of the stock transferred. John Wilson & Son, Limited, v. Inland Revenue, Oct. 22, 1895, p. 18.

PASSIVE TITLE. Lease excluding assignees.

A nineteen years' lease of an urban subject was granted to a tenant and his heirs, but excluding assignees and subtenants without the consent of the lessor. On the death of the tenant, his heir took up the lease. Held that the heir did not incur passive representation for the debts of his predecessor, in respect that he took the lease, not as representing his ancestor, but in his own right under the lease. Bain v. Mackenzie, Feb. 25, 1896, p. 528.

1. A paint manufacturer took out a patent for a gold paint made by mixing dissolved liquid pyroxylin with metallic substances in a powdered state. In an action for infringement against a person who was proved to have sold a gold paint of the same chemical composition, the defender pleaded that the patent was invalid by reason of prior use, and proved that prior to the date of the patent he had publicly used and sold his gold paint, which he had made by mixing a compound known as "Hartley's kristaline," of the composition of which he was ignorant, with metallic substances in a powdered state. It was proved that "Hartley's kristaline" was dissolved liquid pyroxylin. Held that the patent was invalid by reason of prior use. Gill v. Cutler, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 371.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Interdict.

2. A paint manufacturer in Aberdeen brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against a paint merchant there, to have him interdicted from making, using, and selling a paint which the pursuer alleged was an infringement of a patent which he had taken out. After the action was raised a paint manufacturer in Birmingham craved to be sisted as a defender, on the ground that he was the manufacturer of the paint sold by the defender, and thus had the real interest in defending the action. The Birmingham manufacturer was sisted accordingly. Thereafter the original defender withdrew from the action, interdict being pronounced against him, of consent and with the concurrence of the Birmingham manufacturer, and a record was made up between the pursuers and the Birmingham manufacturer, in which the latter raised the question of the validity of the pursuers' patent. After a proof, the Sheriff affirmed the validity of the patent, and granted interdict against the Birmingham manufacturer. In an appeal, held that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to pronounce this interlocutor. Gill v. Cutler, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 371.

POINDING. Delay in selling poinded effects—Supervening cessio of debtor—Right of poinding creditor to a preference.

1. A creditor executed a poinding of his debtor's effects on 25th July 1893, but took no further steps in the poinding, the debtor having from time to time made payments to account. Sixteen months thereafter the debtor took out cessio, and the poinding creditor lodged a claim to a preferable ranking in the cessio. Held that there had been undue delay on the creditor's part in following out his diligence by a sale of the poinded effects, and that the poinding was in consequence inept to found a preference. Henderson v. Grant, March 17, 1896, p. 659.

Warrant to recover penalty by poinding—Vaccination (Scotland) Act, 1863, secs. 18 and 25.

2. Conviction of a contravention of the Vaccination Act suspended in respect that it contained a warrant for poinding which was ultra vires, and that it was impossible to separate the warrant to poind from the remainder of the sentence so as to leave a sentence which was valid in terms of the Act. Moffat v. Shaw, Jan. 8, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 18.

POINDING OF THE GROUND.

Right in Security—Registered bond and assignation in security of long lease—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 4.

1. Held that the creditor under a bond and assignation of a ninety-nine years' lease duly recorded in terms of the Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 4, was not entitled to warrant for poinding of the ground. Luke v. Wallace, March 13, 1896, p. 634.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Preference—Ground-annual—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 118.

2. Held that the creditor under a contract of ground-annual is entitled to the benefit of the proviso of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 118, the annual payments under the contract being truly the interest on a debt of which the principal is the capitalised value of the annual payments. Bell's Trustees v. Copeland & Co., March 13, 1896, p. 650.

POLICE. Police Commissioners—Power to delegate to a committee—Imposition of Assessment—Burgh Police Act, 1892, sec. 54.

1. Held that under section 54 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, Commissioners are entitled to delegate to a committee the power of hearing and deciding appeals under section 368 against assessments. Brown v. Magistrates of Leith, March 17, 1896, p. 654.

Assessment—Private Improvement Expenses—Police Commissioners—Finality Clause—Review—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, secs. 339 and 368.

2. The owner of property abutting on a private street appealed to the Commissioners under sec. 368 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, against an assessment imposed upon him for private improvement expenses. The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. He then appealed to the Court of Session under sec. 339. Held that the appellant having submitted the question of his liability to pay the assessment to the Commissioners their decision was under sec. 368 final, and that the appeal was incompetent. Brown v. Magistrates of Leith, March 17, 1896, p. 654.

Assessment—County General Assessment—Statute—Construction—County Council—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, secs. 11, 26, and 27.

3. In an action brought by a parliamentary burgh against a county council for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to assess the pursuers' lands within the burgh for county general assessment under the County General Assessment Act, 1868, held (1) that by secs. 26 and 27 of the Local Government Act, 1889, the whole assessing powers derived by a county council from prior Acts were merged in the power given to assess for consolidated rates, and that a county council had no other power to assess; and (2) that a county council's power to assess being limited to lands and heritages within the county as defined by the Act, they were not entitled to assess lands or heritages within a royal or parliamentary burgh. Corporation of Galashiels v. County Council of Selkirk, June 18, 1896, p. 818.

Assessment—Water Supply—Whole parish supplied by one system of water-works—Burgh formed within parish after 1889, and created a special water supply district—Residue of parish formed into a separate water supply district—County Council—Burgh Police Commissioners—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 99.

4. In 1876 the Parochial Board of Wemyss, as the Local Authority under the Public Health Act, 1867, introduced a water supply for the whole parish from a source outside the parish, the only works within the parish being the distributing mains. On the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, the Kirkcaldy District Committee of the County Council of Fife came in place of the Parochial Board as Local Authority, and the water-works were vested in them. The requisite expenditure was levied upon the whole property in the parish. In 1891 a district of the parish was created a police burgh, and subsequently formed into a special water supply district. In 1892 the remaining part of the parish was formed into a special water supply district. The existing system of water-works for the supply of the whole parish was continued. In a question between the District Committee of the County Council and the Police Commissioners of the burgh, held (1) that the water supply and water-works fell to be managed by the subcommittee of the District Committee appointed under sec. 81 of the Local Government Act, 1889, and the Police Commissioners (or so many of the Police Commissioners as the Sheriff should fix as a committee) jointly; and (2) that the Police Commissioners were alone entitled to impose and levy the necessary assessments within the burgh. Kirkcaldy District Committee v. Police Commissioners of Buckhaven, &c., Nov. 16, 1895, p. 107.

Assessment—Special water supply—Agreement between Local Authorities—Ultra vires.

5. A Parochial Board, as the Local Authority for the parish under the Public Health Act, 1867, having formed a Special Water Supply District, entered into an agreement with the Police Commissioners of a neighbouring burgh, whereby, in consideration of obtaining a supply of water for the Special Water District, the Parochial Board agreed to assess the inhabitants of the Special Water District at the same rate as the inhabitants of the burgh were assessed, and to pay over the proceeds to the Commissioners. Held that the agreement prescribed a mode of assessment for the Special Water District which was not in accordance with the statutory powers of the Local Authority imposing the assessment, and that, in so far as it did so, it was invalid. Wordie's Trustees v. County Council of Lanarkshire, Nov. 22, 1895, p. 168.

Assessment—Drainage—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 332-5—Glasgow Police Amendment Act, 1890, sec. 16.

6. The Glasgow Police Commissioners having found the drains of a block of houses to be defective, issued an order in terms of section 16 of the Glasgow Police Amendment Act. The owner having failed to obey the order, the Police Commissioners proceeded to execute certain work, on the advice of their sanitary engineer, discarding as useless the materials of the old drain, and constructing at a safer distance from the property a new drain in a different site, and with a different outflow. In an action by the Police Commissioners against the owner for the expenses of the work, the Court assoilzied the defender on the ground that the proceedings of the pursuers were not warranted by section 16 of the Act of 1890, in respect that it only contemplated repairs to existing structures, and not the formation of a new system of drainage. Glasgow Police Commissioners v. M'Omish & Arthur, June 26, 1896, p. 896.

Regulation of streets and buildings—Free space for air—Statute—Implied repeal—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 370 and 372—Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1892, sec. 33.

7. Held that the exemption, in section 372 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866, of corner buildings from the provisions requiring a certain amount of free space for air, was not repealed by section 33 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1892, the purpose of the latter section being merely to define the character of the requisite free space in the case of buildings which under the principal Act were required to have free space, but not to enact that buildings which had previously been exempt should for the future comply with the provisions regarding free space. Raeside v. White, July 17, 1896, p. 1119.

Regulation of streets and buildings—Open space attached to dwelling-house—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 170.

8. The proprietor of ground within a burgh proposed to build thereon two rows of dwelling-houses parallel to each other, both facing public streets and with unbuilt-on ground separating them behind. This back ground was less than one and a-half times the extent of the combined areas to be occupied by the two rows of houses, but was greater than three-fourths of the area to be occupied by each row taken separately. Held that the whole of the back ground was open space directly attached to each of the rows of houses in the sense of section 170 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, and consequently that the statutory requirements with respect to ventilation behind the house would be satisfied. Hoy v. Magistrates of Portobello, July 15, 1896, p. 1039.

Regulation of streets and buildings—Obstruction of street—Nuisance—Interdict.

9. A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the street by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. The town-council, which was the Local Authority, approved of these operations. In a suspension and interdict brought by an inhabitant to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, held that as the Local Authority were entrusted with the duty of seeing that the streets were cleared in such emergencies as a heavy snowstorm, and as they approved of the methods employed by the tramway company, the note of suspension and interdict fell to be refused. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramways Co., Dec. 20, 1895, p. 340.

Police Offences—Assembling on street for purpose of betting—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 393.

10. A person convicted of a contravention of section 393 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, appealed on a case which stated—that the appellant was a bookmaker; that on the occasion specified in the complaint he was walking up and down one of the streets of the burgh; that a young man, whose name was not disclosed, "joined the appellant and handed him a piece of white paper. The appellant looked at it and put it" into his pocket. "The young man then handed him two or three pieces of money, apparently silver, which the appellant also put in his pocket"; that the appellant was apprehended and the young man disappeared; that on being searched there was found on the appellant's person fifty-four "betting lines," telegrams, a sporting paper, a note-book containing the names of horses, and about £28 in money; and that what took place between the appellant and the young man "was in accordance with the mode in which street betting is carried on." The Court quashed the conviction, holding that the facts proved did not amount to assembling on the street for the purpose of betting. Bonnar v. Walker, Jan. 9, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 39.

Police Offences—Bye-law regulating omnibus traffic—Loitering—Relevancy.

11. A bye-law framed by the magistrates of a burgh for the regulation of omnibus traffic provided as follows:—"The driver of an omnibus shall not loiter therewith on the public streets, either when on the way to its stance, before starting, or at any other time." A driver was charged with a contravention of the bye-law in so far as he did on a certain date, with an omnibus of which he was driver, loiter on a certain public street. It was proved that the accused drove his omnibus at a slow walking pace four times along a street, stopping to take up passengers, before starting for his destination. The street was not crowded, and the omnibus caused no danger, obstruction, or inconvenience. Held that the facts proved did not justify the conviction, even if the charge were relevant. Fairfoul v. Somerville, Oct. 25, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 6.

POOR. Officials—Inspector of Poor—Union of parishes—Transfer of existing officers—Right of new Parish Council to refuse to employ one of two inspectors of former parishes—Order by Secretary for Scotland—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 51—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, secs. 46 and 51.

1. By an order the Secretary for Scotland united the parishes of A and V, and declared that the former parish councils should cease, and their whole powers, rights, duties, property, liabilities, debts, officers, and servants should be transferred to the parish council of the new parish. The new Parish Council thereafter appointed Stuart, the former inspector of poor for V, to be inspector for the united parish, and refused to regard Seaton, the former inspector of A, as in their employment. In an action against them at the instance of Seaton for payment of his salary as an inspector, they maintained (1) that the old parishes having been abolished, their officers had also ceased to exist; and (2) that the clause in the order transferring existing officers to the new Parish Council was invalid, in respect it did not provide for the adjustment and distribution of their duties. Held that the order was valid, and that the inspectors of the pre-existing parishes continued to hold office as servants of the new Parish Council. Seaton v. Parish Council of Arbroath and St Vigeans, May 28, 1896, p. 763.

Officials—Trust—Chairman of Parochial Board ex officio trustee—Parish Council succeeding to Parochial Board—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, secs. 21 and 22.

2. A truster in 1885 nominated among her trustees "the chairman of the Parochial Board of the parish of K. and his successor in office for the time being, so long as such board shall exist." Held that the chairman of the Parish Council of K. was not entitled ex officio to act as a trustee under the deed. Parish Council of Kilmarnock v. Ossington's Trustees, June 20, 1896, p. 833.

Relief—Recourse against other parishes—Admission of liability—Proof of residential settlement.

3. In 1892 Barony Parish gave parochial relief for seven days to three illegitimate children of a married woman who had been deserted by her husband in 1879. Barony having claimed repayment from Rutherglen, the husband's birth parish, Rutherglen resisted the claim on the ground that the woman had acquired a settlement in Barony by continuous residence therein for five years from August 1883. The two parishes then entered into a joint investigation, in the course of which a signed statement was taken from the woman setting forth her successive places of residence during the five years in question. All these places of residence were in Barony. Thereafter Barony withdrew its claim. In 1895 the question again arose as to the liability of Rutherglen or Barony for the maintenance of the children, the question still depending on whether the mother had by 1888 acquired a settlement in Barony. The mother had died, and the only evidence, in addition to her statement above mentioned, was the children's birth certificates, which corroborated the mother's statement. Held (1) that the mere fact that Barony withdrew its claim in 1892 did not import an admission of liability; but (2) that the evidence as a whole shewed that the mother had acquired a residential settlement in Barony Parish. Parish Council of Rutherglen v. Parish Council of Barony, July 11, 1896, p. 1018.

POOR—Continued.

Relief—Residential Settlement—Interruption of acquisition by receipt of parochial relief.

4. Held that the acquisition of a residential settlement had not been interrupted by the pauper having received small sums from a parochial board for the purchase of medicine, the pauper not having been a proper object of relief at the time she received these sums. Parish Council of Rutherglen v. Parish Council of Barony, July 11, 1896, p. 1018.

Question, whether a feu-charter granted by trustees in 1867, and bearing to be granted in the exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of Parliament (which was mentioned), and only in so far as consistent with the Act, could be validated by prescriptive possession, so as to exclude the plea that it was ultra vires of the trustees in respect that the conditions of the Act had not been complied with. PROCESS. Citation—Edictal Citation—Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 9.

1. A landlord presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for the appointment of a manager upon a farm, alleging that the tenant had deserted the farm and gone to America. The warrant of citation contained no warrant to cite the respondent edictally, and the petition was served by leaving a copy at the farmhouse, where his family continued to reside. No appearance having been entered for the tenant, the petition was granted. The tenant, who returned to this country within a month, brought an action of reduction of the appointment of the manager on the ground, inter alia, that there had been no edictal citation. In the action he averred that he had been only temporarily absent from the farm. The Court repelled the plea, on the ground that if the defender's absence was temporary edictal citation was not necessary. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

Citation—Execution of Citation.

2. In a Sheriff Court petition the service copy of the petition bore a citation dated 1st September, requiring the defender to lodge a notice of appearance "within forty-eight hours after the date of this my citation"; the execution returned upon the petition bore that it was served upon the 31st August; and the Sheriff pronounced decree in absence on 3d September. In a reduction of the execution, held that in the absence of other contradictory evidence than the service copy of the petition, with the citation thereon, the date of the execution fell to be taken as the date of service, and that the inducice fell to be reckoned therefrom. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

Summons—Amendment—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

3. A firm of iron-merchants raised an action against a rivet manufacturer, concluding for payment of (1) £175; (2) £172, 18s. 11d; (3) £23, 9s. 6d.; (4) £232, 8s. 10d. In the condescendence the pursuers averred that the defender had entered into a contract to supply the pursuers with 100 tons of rivets, and that in consequence of the defender failing to implement his contract the pursuers had been unable to execute a contract they had made with a shipbuilding company to supply the same quantity of rivets, and had been found liable in an action to pay them the above sums (1) and (2) as damages and costs, and that the pursuers had also lost (3) £23, 9s. 6d., the profits they would have made on the two contracts, and (4) the amount of their solicitor's account in defending the action. The Lord Ordinary having assoilzied the defender, the pursuers reclaimed, and craved leave to amend the summons by adding an alternative conclusion for payment of £300, and a statement that this sum was the difference between the market price of the rivets undelivered at the date when they should have been delivered, and the contract price. Held that the amendment was incompetent. Russell, Hope, & Co. v. Pillans, Dec. 7, 1895, p. 256.

Amendment—Summons—Arrestment on the dependence—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

4. An action was raised at the instance of five pursuers, on separate grounds of action, concluding for payment to each of separate sums, and arrestments were used on the dependence of the action. Subsequently, on the motion of the pursuers, the names of four of the pursuers were deleted from the summons, together with the conclusions applicable to them respectively. The remaining pursuer afterwards obtained a decree. Held (1) that the original summons was incompetent; and (2) that the alteration on the summons was an amendment in the sense of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29, and did not validate the arrestments so as to confer a preference on the remaining pursuer in competition with other creditors of the defender at the date of the arrestment. Fischer & Co. v. Andersen, Jan. 15, 1896, p. 395.

Amendment of Record in Inner-House—Expenses.

5. An amendment of record in the Inner-House which did not involve any radical alteration of the pleadings, or a change of the ground of action, allowed on payment of expenses in the Inner-House. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 449.

Caution for Expenses—Action of damages for slander—Bankrupt pursuer.

6. Circumstances in which, after issues had been adjusted in an action of damages for slander, the Court ordained the pursuer, who was an undischarged bankrupt, to find caution. Powell v. Long, July 3, 1896, p. 955.

"All parties not called"—Feu with minerals reserved to granter—Lease of minerals—Damage caused to feu by working of minerals—Action by feuar against granter.

7. A granted a feu of certain subjects, reserving the minerals, and afterwards leased the minerals. Injury having subsequently been occasioned to the surface of the feu by the workings of the mineral tenants, the feuar raised an action of damages against A. The defender, averring that the injury was due solely to the fault of the mineral tenants, pleaded, "All parties not called." Held that the pursuer was entitled to proceed with his action without calling the mineral tenants. Highgate & Co. v. Magistrates of Paisley, July 9, 1896, p. 992.

Consignation—Statute—Construction—Consignation by bondholder of surplus price—Court of Session Consignations (Scotland) Act, 1895, secs. 2, 3, and 5—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, sec. 122.

8. Held that the Court of Session Consignations Act, 1895, did not apply to surplus moneys deposited by a bondholder under sec. 122 of the Titles to Land Act, 1868.

Opinions as to the effect of any Act of Parliament directing money to be consigned subject to the orders of the Court reserved. Antrobus, July 15, 1896, p. 1032.

Remit—Company—Remit to Taxing-Master of the House of Commons to tax promoter's account—Finality of report.

9. In an action of accounting brought by a public company against one of its promoters, the defender lodged certain counter claims. The account of these lodged by the defender was remitted to the Taxing-Master of the House of Commons, who taxed the account. The pursuer lodged objections to the report, mainly on the ground that the Taxing-Master did not state in detail the method adopted by him in dealing with disputed items. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor remitting these objections to the Taxing-Master. The Court recalled his interlocutor, in respect that it did not appear that the reporter had mistaken the duty entrusted to him, or come to a wrong conclusion on any matter of principle. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co. v. Mann, July 15, 1896, p. 1056.

Sist—Action to negative alleged right of way—Sist to give County Council opportunity to intervene—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, sec. 42.

10. The proprietor of an estate brought an action against R., concluding for declarator that he held the estate free of any public right of way over a certain part of it, and for interdict against the defender entering upon it. R., who had used a path over the part of the estate in question for sixteen years, lodged defences. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. Shortly before the diet fixed for proof the defender moved the Lord Ordinary to sist the action, upon the ground that, his funds being exhausted, he was unable to make the necessary preparations for the proof, and that the case was being considered by the County Council, who were entitled under the Local Government Act, 1894, to take steps to vindicate rights of way. The Lord Ordinary refused the motion, and the defender having failed to appear at the proof the Lord Ordinary granted decree as against R. as concluded for. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and sisted the action hoc statu upon an undertaking by the defender not to use the path during the sist. Alston v. Ross, Dec. 12, 1895, p. 273.

Abandonment of action—Trustee in sequestration—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 10.

11. The trustee in a sequestration, who had sisted himself as pursuer, and carried on an action raised by the bankrupt prior to sequestration, lodged a minute craving leave to abandon the action. The minuter did not found on the Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 10, and did not propose to pay the defenders' expenses. The Court refused the minute. Scott v. Thurso River Harbour Trustees, Dec. 11, 1895, p. 268.

Decree—Correction by Clerk of Court before extract—Diligence—Suspension—Nobile officium.

12. In writing the interlocutor in a cause in which the Court had pronounced judgment for £41 in favour of the pursuer, the Clerk of Court, by a clerical error, wrote £14 for £41, and the interlocutor was signed by the presiding Judge. The Clerk corrected the error before extract, but failed to have the alteration authenticated by the Judge. The interlocutor having been extracted, the defender was charged to make payment, and the days of charge having expired without payment being made, the defender's goods were poinded. The defender thereupon presented in the Bill-Chamber a note of suspension of the decree and the proceedings thereon. The agents-disbursers of the pursuer, in whose name decree had been extracted and the charge given, presented a petition praying the Court to confirm and authenticate the Clerk of Court's amendment. The Lord Ordinary on the Bills reported the suspension. The Court informed the Lord Ordinary on the Bills that the interlocutor as amended correctly expressed the judgment of the Court, and held it to be unnecessary to pronounce any order on the petition. Clark & Macdonald v. Bain, Nov. 16, 1895, p. 102.

Decree—Denial that interlocutor bearing to proceed upon consent of party had been consented to—Power of Court to order inquiry.

13. A decree by a Sheriff-substitute appointing a petitioner executor-dative proceeded on the statement that the respondent had withdrawn her opposition. In an appeal by the respondent, the appellant stated that the Sheriff-substitute was mistaken in supposing that she had withdrawn her opposition, and asked for a proof on that point. The Court proposed in the first instance to remit to the Sheriff-substitute for a report, and the appellant having objected to this course, refused the appeal. Whyte v. Whyte, Dec. 17, 1895, p. 320.

Decree—Decree in absence—Mandate to lodge defences.

14. In an action by A against a Danish company defences were lodged on the instructions of a person resident in Scotland. The pursuer on the case appearing in the Adjustment Roll objected that the defences had been lodged without the authority of the defender, and moved for decree in absence. The Lord Ordinary, after adjourning the adjustment of the record on three occasions in order to allow a mandate to be produced, but without pronouncing an order for the production of a mandate, refused a minute craving further delay alleged to be necessary to allow a meeting of the company to be called for the purpose of granting a mandate, and granted decree in absence. In a competition between A and another creditor of the company, held that the decree in absence was irregular, and could not receive effect. Fischer & Co. v. Andersen, Jan. 15, 1896, p. 395.

Decree—Competency of decerning for aliment in pending action of separation and aliment after decree of divorce at instance of wife.

15. A wife, after obtaining an interim award of aliment in an action of separation and aliment against her husband, raised an action of divorce against him, and obtained decree therein. She then, in the action of separation and aliment, moved for decree for a further sum in name of aliment. Except the sum paid under the interim award she had received nothing from her husband in name of aliment pending the actions, and she alleged that she had been alimented by third parties. The Court refused the motion as incompetent, in respect that there could be no decerniture for aliment in an action of separation and aliment after the parties had been divorced, an action of separation and aliment proceeding on the assumption that the parties were husband and wife. Shirrefs v. Shirrefs, June 16, 1896, p. 807.

Reclaiming Note—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1850, sec. 11—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 53.

16. A Lord Ordinary, who had previously assoilzied the defenders in an action and found them entitled to expenses, reserving as to modification, pronounced an interlocutor approving of the Auditor's report on the defenders' account, modifying the taxed amount, and decerning for the amount as modified. Held that it was competent to reclaim against this interlocutor within twenty-one days. Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gavigan, May 21, 1896, p. 738.

Proof—Diligence for recovery of documents—Public Government Board—Inland Revenue—Instructions issued to officers of Inland Revenue—Reparation—Personal injury.

17. In an action at the instance of an excise officer against a firm of brewers for damages for injuries sustained by the pursuer, while engaged in the performance of his duty in sampling liquors in the defenders' premises, the defenders moved for a diligence to recover the instructions issued by the Inland Revenue to their officers as to their duties in drawing samples. The Board of Inland Revenue objected on the ground that the recovery sought would be prejudicial to the public service. The Court refused the diligence. Tierney v. Ballingall & Son, Feb. 19, 1896, p. 512.

Proof—Diligence for recovery of documents—Breach of Promise of Marriage.

18. In an action of damages for breach of promise of marriage the pursuer moved for a diligence to recover the defender's business books and bank books in order to disclose his financial position. Circumstances in which the Court refused the motion. Somerville v. Thomson, March 6, 1896, p. 576.

Proof—Diligence for recovery of documents—Reports by railway servants to railway company regarding accident—Reparation—Injury to passenger.

19. In an action against a railway company for damages on account of the death of a passenger, the pursuers moved for a diligence to recover reports by the company's servants to the company regarding the accident. Diligence refused, on the ground that such reports were confidential. Stuart v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., July 9, 1896, p. 1005.

Proof—Parent and Child—Filiation—General averment in defence that pursuer had intercourse with other men—Allowance of proof of averments generally—Competency of specific questions as to such intercourse.

20. In defence to an action of filiation and aliment relating to an illegitimate child born in December 1895, the defender denied the paternity, and averred "that about 1894 and 1895 the pursuer was indulging in sexual intercourse with several young men living in her own neighbourhood, among them being" three men named, "and that one of them is the father of the child." The parties were allowed a proof "of their respective averments on record." Held that, whether the averment quoted was irrelevant for want of specification or not, as the defender had been allowed a proof of his averments, he was entitled at the proof to ask the men named in his averment whether they had had intercourse with the pursuer on particular occasions in the period specified. Barr v. Bain, July 17, 1896, p. 1090.

Proof—Jury Trial—Issue—Motion to vary—Substitution of new issue—Dismissal of action—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28—A. S., 14*th October* 1868, sec. 6.

21. Upon a motion to vary the terms of an issue, it is incompetent either (1) for a party to propose a new issue resting upon an entirely separate ground of action, or (2) for the Court to disallow altogether the issue whose terms are sought to be varied, and dismiss the action as irrelevant.

Observed, per Lord M'Laren, that when it is desired to substitute one issue for another, a reclaiming note, and not a motion to vary, is the proper mode of bringing the case into the Inner-House. Burns v. Diamond, Feb. 18, 1896, p. 507.

Particular actions—Declarator—Relevancy—Trust—Powers—Object of power—Church.

22. A church in Manchester was held by trustees under a trust-deed which entitled them to sell the church, it being declared that in the event of a sale the proceeds should be held by the trustees for such purposes as the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh should direct. The church was sold, and in consequence the congregation was dissolved. The minister raised an action against the Presbytery of Edinburgh and the trustees for declarator that a majority of the Presbytery might competently direct the trustees to make payment to the pursuer of such sums as the majority of the Presbytery might appoint by way of compensation to the pursuer for loss of stipend or otherwise. The pursuer averred that a majority of the members of the Presbytery were willing to direct an allowance to be made to him if they were satisfied of the competency of doing so. Held that the action was not relevant, as the pursuer's statement did not shew that he was an object of the power given to the majority of the Presbytery of Edinburgh. Mackie v. Presbytery of Edinburgh, March 17, 1896, p. 668.

Particular actions—Petition—Petition for amendment of scheme for administration of educational endowment—Consent of Scotch Education Department—Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 20.

23. A petition for the amendment of a scheme framed for the administration of an educational endowment by the Educational Endowments Commissioners, bore to be presented with the consent of the Scotch Education Department, as required by section 20 of the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, but in point of fact the consent of the Department was not given until after the date of an interlocutor appointing intimation and service. Held that although the presentation of the petition was a reprehensible irregularity, the consent given pendente processu entitled the Court to entertain the application. Governors of Bell's Trust, June 9, 1896, p. 780.

Particular actions—Petition—Petition to Dean of Guild—Answers lodged for first time on appeal—Competency—Procedure.

24. In a petition to the Dean of Guild for warrant to alter a building the Burgh Engineer appeared on behalf of the Lord Provost and Magistrates, who were called as respondents, and objected verbally to the petition being granted. The Dean of Guild having refused the petition, the petitioners appealed, and thereafter answers were tendered for the Lord Provost and Magistrates, embodying the verbal objections previously stated on their behalf. The petitioners objected to the answers being received. The Court allowed the answers to be received, and remitted the case to the Dean of Guild to proceed. Lord Saltoun v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, July 3, 1896, p. 956.

Particular actions—Petition—Petition for reconstitution of District Fishery Board—Intimation.

26. Particular actions—Reduction—Church—Voluntary Church—Suspension of Minister—Restoration to status.

28. A minister of the United Presbyterian Church was served with a libel for an alleged offence, and was suspended from the ministry till the decision of the case. After a proof, the Presbytery found the charge proved. The minister appealed to the Synod, who remitted the case to a commission. The commission found certain counts in the libel proved, and suspended the minister sine die. The minister brought an action (1) for declarator that he had been libelled and suspended contrary to the rules of the Church; (2) "in case it may be necessary," for reduction of the decree of suspension pronounced by the commission; and (3) for interdict against the defenders proceeding to fill his charge, or deprive him of the status or emoluments of his office. He reserved his right to claim damages. The pursuer having intimated that he did not insist in the conclusions for declarator and interdict, but only in that for reduction of the sentence of the commission, the Court dismissed the conclusion for reduction, on the grounds (1) that that conclusion was merely ancillary to the conclusions for declarator and interdict; and (2) that reduction of the sentence by the commission would leave the pursuer under the original suspension, and would not restore his status as a minister, or lead to the establishment of any patrimonial right. Skerret v. Oliver, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 468.

Particular actions—Reduction—Church—Voluntary Church—Contract—Suspension of Minister—Specific implement—Restoration to office.

29. In an action by a minister of a congregation of the United Presbyterian Church against the Synod concluding (1) for reduction of a sentence of suspension pronounced against him by a committee of the Synod to whom the Synod had remitted the trial of a libel against him, on the allegation that it was ultra vires of the Synod to make the remit, and (2) for interdict against the defenders filling up his charge, held by Lord Kincairney (1) that the pursuer had relevantly averred a breach of contract, causing an injury which was of a patrimonial character, or of a character equivalent to patrimonial; (2) that the suspension by the committee being alleged to be ultra vires, appeal to the Court was not excluded by a provision in the contract that members should not have recourse to the civil Courts against judgments of the Courts of the Church; but (3) that reduction of the sentence of suspension, to the effect of restoring the pursuer to office, was not a remedy which the Court ought to grant, or was in use to grant, in similar cases, and that the action fell to be dismissed. Skerret v. Oliver, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 468.

Particular actions—Reduction—Church—Voluntary Church—Action to reduce decree of suspension—Who must be called as defenders—Citation of Synod and Presbytery.

30. In an action by a minister of the United Presbyterian Church, for reduction of a decree suspending him from his office, and for restoration to his office, with its emoluments, held by Lord Kincairney (Ordinary), and acquiesced in, (1) that it was sufficient to call as defenders the prosecuting members of the Presbytery, the Synod, and a commission of the Synod by whom the sentence complained of had been pronounced; (2) that the Synod was validly cited by its office-bearers being called; and (3) that the Presbytery was not a proper defender, but was validly cited for its interest, by its office-bearers being called. Skerret v. Oliver, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 468.

Particular actions—Reduction—Reduction of Sheriff Court Decree—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 64-67—Act of Sederunt, March 10, 1870, sec. 3, subsec. 5.

31. Held (by Lord Kincairney and acquiesced in) (1) that the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, had not rendered an action for reduction of an extracted Sheriff Court decree incompetent; and (2) that it was not incompetent to include in such action of reduction conclusions additional to those contained in the Sheriff Court process for the purpose of more clearly elucidating the rights of parties. Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gavigan, July 3, 1896, p. 945.

Particular actions—Reduction—Reduction of Sheriff Court Decree.

32. Reduction of Sheriff Court decree appointing a manager of a firm on its alleged desertion by its tenant. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

Particular actions—Special Case—Competency—Failure to set out contentions of parties.

33. Held that a special case in which the contentions of parties were not set forth was not in competent form. Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, Nov. 14, 1895, p. 93.

Particular actions—Special Case—Competency—Absence of Lis.

34. Held that a special case which was brought for the purpose of ascertaining the true construction of an Act of Parliament, but which disclosed no controversy between the parties, was incompetent. County Council of Renfrew v. Trustees for Orphan Homes of Scotland, Nov. 22, 1895, p. 166.

Appeal—Competency—Sheriff—Value of cause—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 12 and 13.

35. Held that when a Sheriff's judgment in an action for payment of a sum under £25 involves the determination of a question as to the defender's liability for further payments, an appeal to the Court of Session will not be competent unless it appears from the process that the amount involved in the determination is over £25. Standard Shipowners' Mutual Association v. Taylor, June 24, 1896, p. 870.

Appeal—Competency—Value of cause—Cessio—Affidavit and Claim—Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 22—Sheriff Courts Act, 1876, sec. 26 (4).

36. A creditor who had poinded some of his debtor's effects thereafter lodged an affidavit and claim in the latter's cessio in which he stated the amount of the debt due to him to be £42, and claimed a preferable ranking to the effect of receiving full payment of his debt out of the poinded effects. The trustee admitted his claim to an ordinary ranking only, and his deliverance was sustained by the Sheriff. The value of the poinded effects was £18. The creditor appealed to the Court of Session. The trustee objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the only question was the creditor's right to a preferable ranking, and that the actual sum in dispute was therefore below £25. Held that the appeal was competent, the value of the cause falling to be ascertained as in an ordinary Sheriff Court action, viz., by the amount of the claim made in the conclusions of the summons, or other initial writ, which here was the affidavit and claim.

expenses. The Commissioners dismissed the appeal. He then appealed to the Court of Session under sec. 339. Held that the appellant having submitted the question of his liability to pay the assessment to the Commissioners their decision was under sec. 368 final, and that the appeal was incompetent. Brown v. Magistrates of Leith, March 17, 1896, p. 654.

Appeal—Competency—Friendly Society—Dispute between member and society—Small-Debt Court—Friendly Societies Act, 1875, sec. 22 (d) (e).

38. Held that in a small-debt action relative to a dispute between a friendly society and one of its members, an appeal, on a case stated under the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, was competent, although the summons did not refer to the Act. Linton v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society, Oct. 30, 1895, p. 51.

Appeal for jury trial—Competency—Consent to proof before answer precluding appeal for jury trial.

39. The defenders in an action of damages having pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, the Sheriff, "before answer, of consent" allowed a proof. Held that an appeal for jury trial was incompetent, in respect that the interlocutor set forth a contract between the parties as to the procedure to be followed. Paterson v. Kidd's Trustees, May 21, 1896, p. 737.

Appeal for jury trial—Proof or Jury Trial—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40.

40. In an appeal for jury trial in an action of damages for wrongous interdict, the action having been held to be relevant, the Court, in respect that neither party asked for jury trial, refused the appeal and remitted the case to the Sheriff. Fife v. Orr, Oct. 16, 1895, p. 8.

PROPERTY. Title—Disposition a non domino—Mill-lade—Prescription.

1. A mill-lade from the River Jed supplied two mills belonging to one proprietor, of which the Abbey Mill was the upper and the Waulk Mill the lower. The mills were sold in 1845 to separate persons, A and B, in a process of ranking and sale. By the decree the Lords sold and adjudged to B the Waulk Mill and the mill lands, "and particularly the mill-lade," and they found and declared that A and B, the "purchasers of the two mills, have a joint pro indiviso right of property in the mill-lade thereof." B obtained from the superior of the mills and mill lands a charter in terms of the decree, and was infeft thereon in 1846, and the mill-lade was subsequently possessed along with the mills. Part of the mill-lade had been made on half of the bed of the river, belonging to C, a riparian proprietor. C did not object to this, and he and his successors continued to use the water of the river by drawing it from the lade. In a suspension and interdict brought in 1894 by the proprietor of the Waulk Mill against C's successor to prevent him from discharging sewage into the lade, the above facts were proved. Held (1) that the conveyance of the mill-lade in the decree of sale and in the subsequent charter imported a conveyance quoad C's land, not of a right of servitude, but of the lade itself and of the ground necessary for its support; (2) that the possession which had followed upon this title for the prescriptive period was sufficient to give B an exclusive right of property in the lade and in the ground supporting it as against C's successor, and that B was entitled to interdict. Hilson v. Scott, Dec. 7, 1895, p. 241.

Competing Titles—Superior and Vassal—School Board possessing transferred school on personal title—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 38.

2. In 1833 A granted a feu-disposition of a portion of the lands of Craigrothie, upon which a schoolhouse had been built, to B, who entered into possession but did not take infeftment. In 1873 B transferred the schoolhouse and ground to the school board of the parish, who got possession, but no formal conveyance in favour of the school board was executed. In 1883 D bought the lands of Craigrothie, and duly completed his titles by infeftment upon a disposition, which contained a clause of warrandice excepting all feu-rights granted by the disponer or his predecessors. In an action brought by the school board against D for declarator of their right to the ground possessed by them, the pursuers founded upon the unfeudalised feu-disposition and on section 38 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, which enacts that when a school has been transferred to a school board, the school and the site shall vest in the school board. The pursuers did not allege that D knew of their right at the date of his purchase. Held (1) that D's right to the lands was not affected by the unfeudalised feu-disposition; and (2) that section 38 of the Act did not give the school board a better title than that of their author, and therefore that their title was not valid in competition with the title of D. Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane, Dec. 12, 1895, p. 279.

Disposition—Warrandice—Exception of existing feu-rights—Unrecorded feu-disposition.

3. Opinions that an exception in a clause of warrandice "of all feu-rights granted by the disponer or his predecessors" fell to be construed as meaning all feu-rights completed by infeftment. Ceres School Board v. M'Farlane, Dec. 12, 1895, p. 279.

Bounding Title—Measurement—Plan—Prescription.

4. A purchaser obtained a conveyance to four acres of ground excepting "those parts and portions thereof sold and disponed by me to A and B, all as specified and described in the disposition thereof by me in their favour, dated 11th July 1864." The disposition of 11th July referred to an annexed plan as delineating the ground conveyed, and also described that ground by measurement. Held that the purchaser's title was a bounding title, and that he could not acquire by prescription any of the subjects excepted from the grant. North British Railway Co. v. Hutton, Feb. 19, 1896, p. 522.

Common Interest—Servitude.

5. A was the proprietor of the ground floor of a tenement, of which B and C owned the upper flats. The titles of all were derived from a common author, and conferred upon each "the following servitude":—"That no buildings shall be erected on the area behind the said tenement nearer the back side wall thereof than nineteen feet, and that the said space of nineteen feet all along the length of the said tenement shall be kept open and unbuilt upon in all time coming, in order to preserve the back lights of the foresaid shops hereby disponed." In an action raised by A in 1893 to have B and C ordained to remove certain wooden posts which they had fixed in the court, the Court held (1) that the parties had a right of common interest in the back court entitling each to prevent the others from erecting any structure upon it; and therefore (2) that it was not material to inquire to what extent the light of the pursuer's flat was interfered with. Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gavigan, July 3, 1896, p. 945.

Servitude—Implied grant—Right of access where disponee owns adjoining ground.

6. A co-operative society were proprietors of a piece of ground with buildings which faced upon the west a street known as Store Brae. In 1872 they acquired a piece of ground adjoining their property on the east under a feu-charter which bound them to erect on the ground a dwelling-house "to be used in the meantime as a bakehouse," and to erect a fence on the east side of the feu. The feu-charter contained no provision as to access. There was an access from Store Brae through the Society's property by a pend four feet wide, but the only practicable access for carts was over a ploughed field belonging to the superior, which bounded the bakehouse feu on the east. In building the bakehouse the society brought carts over this field, and after it was built they continued to use the track as an access for carts. In 1895 the proprietor of the field brought an action against the society for declarator that they had no right of access over it. The defenders pleaded that the grant of the feu for the purpose of building a bakehouse implied a grant of a suitable access, and that the use which had followed the grant shewed its meaning. From a proof it appeared that it was practicable for the bakehouse business to be carried on without an access for carts by the use of hand-barrows from the pend. There was evidence to shew that before commencing the building of the bakehouse the society applied for the superior's permission to bring carts over his field. Held that there was no implied grant of access over the field. Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society, Limited, Nov. 27, 1895, p. 209.

Game—Construction of interlocutor declaring a right of fowling over lands belonging to another person—Extent of privilege.

7. In 1808 Innes, proprietor of Ballogie, was infeft in that estate cum privilegio et libertate aucupandi in the Forest of Birse, which belonged to the Earl of Aboyne. By a judgment of the Court of Session in 1812, affirmed by the House of Lords in 1819, in an action by the Earl against Innes, it was found that the liberty and privilege of fowling was "a franchise conferred as a heritable right rendered an appendage to the property of Ballogie," and further, "that the said privilege may lawfully be exercised by the defender personally, or by his gamekeeper duly authorised for that purpose, or by any qualified friends whom he may permit, whether his tenants on Ballogie or not, or whether the defender be personally present or not, but always in such way and manner as not to be abusively exercised or encroach unreasonably on or absorb the general right of fowling as well as hunting belonging to the pursuer over the said forest." In 1896, in an action at the instance of the Marquis of Huntly, a successor of the Earl of Aboyne, to have the right of Ballogie defined, held that under the interlocutor of 1812 Ballogie was entitled, inter alia, (1) to let his right of shooting in the forest to any persons whether they were or were not tenants of Ballogie; and (2) to sell the game killed by him for sport. Marquis of Huntly v. Nicol, March 12, 1896, p. 610.

Right of majority of members of voluntary association to alienate property of club as a donation.

8. In 1869 a silver cup was presented to the curling clubs of Dumfriesshire for competition as a trophy, and these clubs (which were not incorporated societies) framed rules, under which the cup was to become the property of the club which won the cup twice in succession. In 1893 the cup was so won by the Upper Annandale Club. Thereafter, at a meeting of that club, it was resolved, by a majority of the members present, to present the cup to M. J., who had been skip of the rink which obtained the highest score on the two successive occasions on which the club had won the cup. In an action brought against M. J. by certain members of the club, who had objected to the presentation, held that the club not being an incorporated society the cup was the joint property of all the individual members of the club; that it was ultra vires of a majority of the members thus to give away the joint property against the wishes of the minority; and therefore that the presentation to M. J. was ineffectual. Murray v. Johnstone, July 8, 1896, p. 981.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Burgh—Erection of hospital—Antecedent Approval of Local Government Board—Conditional Approval—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 39—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, sec. 3.

1. The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 39, empowers Local Authorities to build hospitals, "provided" the Local Government Board "approve of the situation and construction thereof." In an application by a burgh Local Authority to the Local Government Board for the approval of the site and plans of a temporary cholera hospital the Board gave its approval thus,—"The Board approve of the site subject to the following conditions . . . 4. That all infected matter (other than clothing, which, if to be used again, must be duly disinfected) is to be disposed of by means of an incinerator . . . The Board approve of the plans, subject to provision being made for the proper disinfection of clothing." Held that this was a valid approval by the Board, under section 39. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Leith, Jan. 11, 1896, p. 383.

Burgh—Erection of hospital by Local Authority "within a convenient distance" from its own district—Right to erect within neighbouring burgh—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, sec. 39—Public Health Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1890, sec. 1.

2. Under the Public Health Acts a burgh Local Authority may with the approval of the Local Government Board erect a hospital within its own district, "or within a convenient distance of such district." Held that the Local Authority of a burgh, with the approval of the Local Government Board, might erect a hospital within the district of a neighbouring burgh. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Magistrates of Leith, Jan. 11, 1896, p. 383.

Slaughter-houses—Place of deposit for carcases of horses—Licence—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 285.

3. The proprietor of premises within a burgh, which were not licensed in terms of section 285 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, appealed against a conviction of having used the premises as a place of deposit for the carcase of a horse, in contravention of the section. The Court sustained the appeal, holding that the facts stated as proved did not in law justify a conviction. Simpson v. Proctor, Jan. 8, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 22.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Certificate—Sequestration of Publican—Right of trustee to delivery of certificate.

1. Held that the trustee upon the sequestrated estate of a publican was prima facie entitled to get delivery from the bankrupt of his permit-book and certificate. Fraser's Trustee v. Fraser, July 8, 1896, p. 978.

Breach of Certificate—Complaint—Inducie—Home Drummond Act, 1828, sec. 23—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 6—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 515.

2. Held that a complaint of breach of a publican's certificate brought under the Summary Procedure Act and the Burgh Police Act, 1892, must be served upon an inducie of six days in terms of the Home Drummond Act, 1828. Laird v. Anderson, Nov. 2, 1895, p. 14.

Breach of Certificate—Complaint—Relevancy—Specification of statute.

3. A complaint charged the accused with an offence "contrary to the Public-Houses (Scotland) Act, 1862, and the Acts 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 67, therein referred to." A conviction was obtained. Held that the complaint was irrelevant for want of specification, and conviction therefore quashed. Buchanan v. Wilson, July 16, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 86.

Breach of Certificate—Hotel Certificate—Contravention— Guest of bona fide traveller—Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862.

4. A hotelkeeper supplied two glasses of liquor on a Sunday to a bona fide traveller for the refreshment of two friends of the bona fide traveller, who were themselves neither bona fide travellers nor lodgers in the hotel. The hotelkeeper knew that the liquor was to be consumed by the friends. It was paid for by the bona fide traveller. Held that the hotelkeeper had not committed a contravention of his certificate. Oliver v. Loudon, Jan. 9, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 34.

Breach of Certificate—Hotel Certificate—Sale of victuals outside of licensed premises — Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, Schedule A.

5. A hotel licence, which authorises the sale in the hotel, "but not elsewhere, of victuals and of spirits," does not preclude the holder from selling victuals elsewhere than in the hotel. Mackenzie v. M'Dougall, Oct. 25, 1895, Just. Cases, p. 3.

"Hawking spirits" — Relevancy of complaint — Specification — Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, secs. 16 and 37.

6. A complaint charged the accused with an offence against the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, and particularly section 16 thereof, in so far as upon a date and at a place specified "he did hawk one pint of spirits to" A B. Held that the complaint was irrelevant, in respect it did not state whether the offence was committed by selling spirits, or by offering spirits for sale. Cameron v. Buchan, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 46.

"Hawking spirits" — Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 16.

7. A hotelkeeper was charged with a contravention of section 16 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, in so far as he did, on 23d November 1895, hawk one pint of spirits to A B. It was proved that the accused, on 22d November, called at A B's house and solicited an order for spirits; that A B gave him an order for one pint of rum, and that this was delivered to him next day, 23d November, by the accused upon the public road. Held that the facts proved did not support the charge of hawking. Cameron v. Buchan, Feb. 7, 1896, Just. Cases, p. 46.

RAILWAY (AND COMPULSORY POWERS GENERALLY). Compulsory acquisition of lands—Arbitration—Interdict.

1. Note of suspension and interdict to stop proceedings in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, refused on the ground that the complainer had failed to shew that the respondent's claim to compensation was not relevant, or to shew any other cause for staying the proceedings in the arbitration. Glasgow, Yoker, and Clydebank Railway Co. v. Lidgerwood, Nov. 27, 1895, p. 195.

Compulsory acquisition of lands—Lease—Compensation to tenant—Lease with break.

2. A tenant of a farm under a lease to Whitsunday 1911, which gave power to the landlord or tenant to terminate it at Whitsunday 1898, being deprived of land by a Local Authority under compulsory powers, claimed, in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, compensation for loss of profits on the basis of the lease extending to Whitsunday 1911. The Local Authority contended that the lease should be taken as ending at Whitsunday 1898. Held that the tenant was entitled to compensation on the footing that the lease endured to Whitsunday 1911, subject to such deduction as the arbiter might consider due to the contingency of its being brought to an end at an earlier date. Fleming v. District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, Nov. 15, 1895, p. 98.

Compulsory powers—Compensation—Yearly tenant—Procedure—Arbitration—Sheriff—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 6—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 114.

3. A claim by a yearly tenant against a railway company for compensation under sec. 6 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, falls to be determined by the Sheriff under sec. 114 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845—and not by arbitration—whether the claim is on account of lands injuriously affected or is on account of lands taken. Glasgow District Subway Co. v. Albin & Son, Nov. 6, 1895, p. 81.

Compulsory powers—Mines and Minerals—Misappropriation of freestone—Reparation—Measure of damages.

4. A railway company having wrongously excavated certain freestone reserved to their superiors, held that the superiors were entitled to recover from the company the market value of the freestone used or removed by them, less the cost of working, although it appeared that the superiors could not themselves have worked or let the freestone to a profit. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 29, 1895, p. 45.

Compulsory powers—Superior and Vassal—Feuar's right to freestone for building on feu—Whether railway bridges and other works within right.

5. A feu-charter, which reserved the freestone to the superior, gave power to the feuar, notwithstanding the reservation, to dig or work the freestone for erecting "houses and offices, or walls or other buildings" upon the feu, or for making or repairing the roads thereon. A railway company having taken over the feu by compulsory purchase, held that it was within the powers of the feuar to dig freestone for the construction of bridges and other railway works on the feu. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 29, 1895, p. 45.

Compulsory powers—Land acquired by voluntary purchase—Conditional incorporation of Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 127.

6. Where a school board acquired land for the site of a school by voluntary purchase, and without adopting the procedure prescribed by section 31 of the Education Act, 1878, and obtaining a confirming Act, held that the school board were not liable under section 127 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, to make good the deficiency in the poor-rates caused by their having acquired the land. Barony Parish Council v. Glasgow School Board, Nov. 28, 1895, p. 221.

Lapse of powers—Level Crossing—Ultra vires—Statute—Incorporation of special Act with general Act—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 16.

7. A special Act obtained by a railway company in 1853 incorporated the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, "so far as not hereby altered or varied," and by its 37th section enacted,—"The railway hereby authorised shall be completed within five years from the passing of this Act, and on the expiration of such period the powers by this Act, or the Acts incorporated, granted to the company for executing the railway, or otherwise in relation thereto, shall cease to be exercised except as to so much of the railway as shall then be completed." The special Act gave compulsory powers to take land for a double line of railway, and to carry the railway over a public road near B. station on the level. The company acquired sufficient land for a double line, but within the five years they only formed a single line. In 1890 the Board of Trade, under the powers of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, required the railway company to interlock the signals at the stations on their line. After the new interlocking arrangements at B. station had been inspected by the Board of Trade inspector, he intimated that they would not be passed unless a loop-line at the station was extended. To effect this alteration it was necessary that a second line of rails should be laid across the road. The District Committee of the County Council thereupon brought an action against the railway company to have it declared that the defenders were not entitled to encroach on the road beyond the line of the existing gates and fences at each side of the level crossing in order to lay the new rails, and for interdict. The pursuers did not dispute that the defenders in constructing the line would have been entitled to lay double rails across the road, but maintained that under sec. 37 of the special Act the defenders' power to do so lapsed at the end of five years. Held that sec. 37 of the special Act did not, after the lapse of the five years, deprive the company of the power given by sec. 16 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, to do all acts necessary for using the railway, and that the defenders were entitled to lay a double line of rails across the road, as this had become necessary for using the railway. Western District Committee of the County Council of Stirling v. North British Railway Co., July 2, 1896, p. 929.

Disputes between companies—Arbitration—Competency of construing award —"Traffic."

8. The Great North of Scotland Railway Company and the Highland Railway referred to A B as arbiter the following question:—"Whether the proviso of section 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865, applies to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Act, 1884, between the two companies at Elgin, or whether the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively, in accordance with their respective mileage, and under the rules of the Clearing House?" The arbiter in his award found "that the proviso of section 82 of the Highland Railway Act, 1865 . . . does not apply to traffic exchanged under the Great North of Scotland Act, 1884, between the two companies at Elgin," and further, "that the receipts of such traffic are to be divided between the two companies respectively, in accordance with their respective mileage, and under the rules of the Clearing House." In an action raised by the Great North of Scotland Railway Company for implement of the award, the defenders made and asked to be allowed a proof of the following averment:—"The terms 'traffic exchanged under the Act of 1884 between the two companies at Elgin,' occurring in the question submitted to A B do not include, and were not intended to include, passenger traffic. This was explained to A B, and he and both the parties acted in the whole proceedings before him on the footing that no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts was submitted to him, and he accordingly decided no question as to the division of passenger traffic receipts." Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that the award was unambiguous, and must receive effect. Highland Railway Co. v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., July 16, 1896, p. 80.

Disputes between Companies—Arbitration—Reference of differences with respect to matters referred to in a section of private Act—Jurisdiction—Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, sec. 6.

9. By the Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Act, 1891, sec. 6, subsec. (4), it was enacted that a railway company should carry their line under certain ground belonging to the North British Railway Company in tunnel, and that in the construction of the tunnel the company should not "without the previous consent of" the North British Company break open the surface of the ground. By subsec. (7) it was enacted that bridges and works passing over or under lands belonging to the North British Company should be according to plans approved of by the engineer of that company. By subsec. (10) it is enacted that "if any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade. . . ." The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground belonging to the North British Company. The questions raised in the action were whether certain plans which had been submitted by the company to and approved of by the engineer of the North British Company disclosed the ventilating shaft, and if they did, whether the engineer's approval was equivalent to the consent required by subsec. (4), or otherwise barred the North British Company from challenging the shaft. The defenders pleaded the reference clause. The pursuers maintained that the questions did not constitute a difference in the sense of subsec. (10), in respect (1) that the erection of the shaft was altogether outwith the statutory powers of the defenders; and (2) that the questions were essentially questions of law. Held that a difference had arisen which fell to be referred in terms of subsec. (10). North British Railway Co. v. Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co., Nov. 5, 1895, p. 76.

Reparation—Carriage—Passengers—Getting out of train not at platform—Invitation to alight.

11. In an action of damages for personal injury against a railway company, the pursuer averred that between five and six o'clock on a January morning he was travelling as a passenger to a station on the defenders' line; that "about 300 yards before entering the station platform, and in a line with, up to, and abutting the coping of the platform, is a parapet wall, which reaches to the footboard of the carriage and resembles the station platform, although it is narrow"; that on the morning in question the train stopped at this parapet wall, and the pursuer in the darkness stepped out on to the wall "thinking it to be the station platform owing to the darkness, and the fact that the defenders systematically were in the habit of leaving" the station "unlit"; and that on discovering where he was, he was about to re-enter the train when it suddenly started again, with the result that the pursuer was precipitated over the wall and injured. The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant. The Court sustained the defenders' plea, and dismissed the action. M'Aulay v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., June 23, 1896, p. 845.

Right of railway to exclude from station persons other than travellers—Exclusion of hotel servants wearing hotel badge—Interdict.

12. The Perth General Station Committee presented a petition to the Sheriff to interdict A B, a hotelkeeper in Perth, "himself, or by his boots, or other servant . . . unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railway stations . . . of the pursuers; and in particular from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises connected therewith, while wearing the uniform or badge of the hotelkeeper, or of his hotel." The petitioners stated that they were proprietors of Perth Station; that on 17th July 1894 they intimated to A B that they had right to prevent, and would not permit, hotel servants wearing hotel badges to appear upon their platforms; that on various occasions in July 1895 A B had sent the boots of his hotel, wearing the hotel uniform and badge, to wait the arrival of certain trains, and that the latter on each occasion had been asked by the petitioners' servants to leave the station, but that he had refused to do so. The defender admitted that in July 1895 he had sent his hotel boots to meet customers arriving by train. The Sheriff refused the petition, and on appeal the Court affirmed the Sheriff's judgment, holding (1) that an interdict against the defender or his servants "unlawfully entering" the station could not be granted, as such an interdict would not specify the act forbidden; and (2) that quoad ultra the interdict sought was merely to prevent hotel servants entering the station in a certain dress to meet customers, and that that was not a case for interdict.

Question, whether the petitioners' right of property in the station was of such a character as to entitle them to exclude from the station all persons other than travellers. Perth General Station Committee v. Ross, June 26, 1896, p. 885.

A steam-trawler was hired out by her owner under a time charter, whereby the charterer was to find crew, stores, &c., and the owner was "to pay insurance only." The owner, inter alia, insured against loss from having to pay damages for injury which might be caused by the trawler to other vessels with the exception of one-fifth of three-fourths of such loss. The trawler, through the fault of the charterer's crew, caused damage to another vessel, and the owner of the trawler, without notice to the charterer, settled the claim, and was reimbursed by the insurance company to the extent of his insurance. In an action raised by the owner against the charterer for the balance of loss, held that as the pursuer had settled the claim without notice to the defender, he had no right of relief against him on the ground that it had been caused by his fault. In an action by the injured workman against his employers for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, held that even if A was, in the sense of section 1, subsection 3, of the Act, a person to whose orders the pursuer was bound to conform, the defenders were not liable, no negligence having been proved. Master and Servant—Coalmaster—Responsibility of coal mining company for defective system of working.

pany in tunnel, and that in the construction of the tunnel the company should not "without the previous consent of" the North British Company break open the surface of the ground. By subsec. (7) it was enacted that bridges and works passing over or under lands belonging to the North British Company should be according to plans approved of by the engineer of that company. By subsec. (10) it is enacted that "if any difference shall at any time arise between the company and the North British Company or their respective engineers, with respect to any of the matters above referred to in this section, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade. . . ." The tunnel having been completed, the North British Company raised an action against the company to have them ordained to remove a ventilating shaft which they had constructed from the roof of the tunnel to the surface of the ground belonging to the North British Company. The questions raised in the action were whether certain plans which had been submitted by the company to and approved of by the engineer of the North British Company disclosed the ventilating shaft, and if they did, whether the engineer's approval was equivalent to the consent required by subsec. (4), or otherwise barred the North British Company from challenging the shaft. The defenders pleaded the reference clause. The pursuers maintained that the questions did not constitute a difference in the sense of subsec. (10), in respect (1) that the erection of the shaft was altogether outwith the statutory powers of the defenders; and (2) that the questions were essentially questions of law. Held that a difference had arisen which fell to be referred in terms of subsec. 1. A workman was injured by the fall of a printers' guillotine which he was assisting to lift into an upright position on a lorry in compliance with the orders of A, one of the men engaged in the operation, who directed the operation to be performed. Master and Servant—Coalmaster—Responsibility of coal mining company for defective system of working.

2. A miner brought an action of damages against his employers, a coal mining company, alleging that he had been injured in consequence of the defenders failing to properly secure the roof of the mine. The action was laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act. The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant at common law, on the ground that they had placed the management of the mine in the hands of a certificated manager, in accordance with the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and that it was not said that they had failed to supply the manager with every appliance for which he asked. Held that the case could not be dismissed as irrelevant at common law, in respect that the record imputed fault to the defenders, as distinguished from their servants, in regard to their system of working, and that it was not impossible that a mining company might be guilty of such fault. Macdonald v. Udston Coal Co., Limited, Feb. 8, 1896, p. 504.

Master and Servant—Railway—Responsibility of railway company for defective equipment of their line.

3. A railway company or other employer is not relieved, by the appointment of competent engineers and managers, from responsibility for injury arising to a servant from a defect in the construction of the works.

In an action for damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act at the instance of the father of a railway servant, the pursuer averred that his son had been run over and killed by a train while acting as a flag-boy at a level crossing; that the train in question was being pushed by an engine behind on a line which formed a curve, close to the place of the accident, round a water-tank, and that the water-tank had been erected by the defenders in such a position as to make it impossible for those in charge of the engine to see whether the line was clear, or to receive signals. The defenders pleaded that there was no relevant case at common law, in respect that there was no averment that the engineers employed to lay out the station and to fix the site of the water-tank were not competent. Held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue at common law. M'Killop v. North British Railway Co., May 29, 1896, p. 768.

Master and Servant—Coal Mine—Person in superintendence—Engineman—Employers Liability Act, 1880, section 1, subsection 2—Fault in failing to light pit.

4. A brought an action of damages against a coal company on account of the death of her son, who had been employed in one of the defenders' pits, and had met his death by falling down the shaft. She claimed damages (1) under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on the ground that the accident was due to the fault of the engineman in hoisting the cage from the midworking, where the pursuer's son was employed, before the indicator shewed that the gate at the entrance to the shaft was closed; and (2) at common law on the ground that the accident had been caused by the defenders' failure properly to light the pit-bottom. Held (1) that the engineman was not a person having superintendence entrusted to him in the sense of subsection 2 of section 1 of the Employers Liability Act, and that the action was therefore irrelevant under the statute; but (2) that there was a case for trial at common law in regard to the alleged failure of the defenders properly to light the pit-bottom. Farnham v. New Bank Coal Co., Limited, May 12, 1896, p. 722.

Master and Servant—Coal Mine—Defect in road in mine—Knowledge of mine-owner—Liability at common law—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1, subsec. (1), sec. 2, subsec. (1), and sec. 8.

5. A miner was injured by the fall of two large stones from the roof of a roadway in the coal mine in which he was employed. In an action by him against his employers for damages, laid both at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, he averred that "the accident was caused through the fault and gross negligence of the defenders, their manager, oversman, and roadsman, in allowing said roof of said road to remain in such an exceedingly dangerous condition"; that "the road had not been properly inspected"; that "the wood supporting the roof and sides where the accident occurred was in a rotten state, and had been in this state for a considerable time before the accident, and contributed to the accident"; and that "this was well known to the defenders, their oversman and roadsman, but no steps were taken to have it remedied." Held that these averments were relevant to infer liability under the Act, and further that the pursuer was entitled to an issue both at common law and under the Act. M'Mullen v. Newhouse Coal Co., May 27, 1896, p. 759.

Master and Servant—Ship—Responsibility of stevedore for defect in ship.

6. Held that a stevedore was not liable for injuries sustained by one of his servants in consequence of defects in the ship upon which the stevedore was employed, there being no particular circumstances to lay the duty of inspection upon him. Simpson v. Paton, March 12, 1896, p. 590.

Master and Servant—Ship—Liability of shipowner to servant of stevedore for defect in ship's gear—Liability of stevedore to his servant for defect in ship's gear.

7. A labourer in the employment of stevedores brought actions for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him through the fall of a stanchion when engaged in discharging the cargo of a ship (1) against the shipowners, and (2) against his own employers. Averments on a consideration of which it was held (1) that the action against the shipowners was relevant; but (2) that the action against the stevedores fell to be dismissed as irrelevant, in respect that the stevedores were under no duty of inspecting the vessel to see to its safety for their servants. M'Lachlan v. s.s. "Peveril" Co., Limited, May 27, 1896, p. 753.

Precautions for safety of public—Defective condition of shop floor—Liability of tenant of shop for injuries to customers—Latent defect.

8. In an action of damages against the tenant of a shop by a woman who, after making some purchases, had fallen through the floor of the shop into a cellar, the following facts were proved:—The shop was an old building. The portion of the floor which gave way underneath the pursuer had been patched many years before, the patching having been effected by sawing off the flooring flush with the two adjacent joists, and nailing pieces of wood termed "fillets" along the joists, upon which was supported the new flooring. The flooring probably gave way owing to the nails fixing the fillets to the joists having become insufficient for that purpose. Previous to the accident, the surface of the floor was to all appearance safe. Anyone going below into the cellar might have seen that the portion in question of the floor rested on fillets and not on the joists; but there was evidence to the effect that such a person merely by looking upwards would not have noticed anything wrong. The defender, who was a yearly tenant, and had been in possession for about three years, had never made any inspection of the floor, and had never been in the cellar (which, though within his tenancy, he did not use), and did not suspect that anything was wrong with the floor. Held that although the defender had no reason to suspect that the floor was insecure, he was in fault in not having it inspected and kept in a safe condition for customers, and that he was liable in damages. Dolan v. Burnet, March 4, 1896, p. 550.

Negligence—Precautions for safety of the public—Lorry standing in street unattended to—Child—Proximate cause of injuries—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 149.

9. A carter in charge of a horse and lorry left his lorry standing unattended on a crowded street in Glasgow and went into a public-house to have a drink. After an absence of a few minutes he returned, and without looking underneath the lorry drove off, seriously injuring a child of six, who had during his absence gone underneath the lorry. In an action of damages by the father of the child against the carter's employer, held that the defender was liable in damages, in respect that the child's injuries were due to the fault of the carter in driving away after he left the public-house without looking underneath the lorry to see that all was safe.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that—assuming the driver to have been guilty of a contravention of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 149, which subjects to a penalty any person who, on any public street, suffers a cart to "stand longer than is necessary for loading or unloading goods"—such contravention did not render the defender liable in damages for the injuries to the child, in respect that the driver's absence from his lorry was not the proximate cause of the injuries. Opinion (per Lord Young) contra. Morrison v. M'Ara, March 6, 1896, p. 564.

Slander—Letter—Complaint to committee of association for sport—Privilege.

10. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that the defender had acted as referee at a football match between members of two clubs belonging to a football union at which the pursuer was one of the players, that the defender had complained by letter to the committee of the union that the pursuer had during the match made offensive remarks about the defender, that the defender had at a meeting of the committee held to investigate the matter, given evidence in support of his complaint, and stated that the pursuer had called him "a bloody little brute,"—and that the pursuer had not used the language complained of. The pursuer set forth several innuendoes as to the import of the same words. The pursuer averred generally that the statements were made by the defender calumniously and maliciously. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, holding (1) that the statements complained of were not per se defamatory, and that the pursuer had not set forth a proper innuendo of a different and libellous meaning; and (2) that even if the words were defamatory, the defender, in the circumstances disclosed in the pursuer's statements on record, was privileged in making the complaint, and in supporting it before the committee, and that the pursuer had made no relevant averment of facts from which malice could be inferred. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 449.

Slander—Association for sport—Resolution of committee—Publication in newspapers—Privilege—Issue.

11. The pursuer of an action of damages for slander called as defenders (1) "The Scottish Football Union and the members of the Committee of the Union" as such committee and as representing the said Union, and (2) certain members of the committee as individuals. The pursuer averred that the committee in consequence of a complaint by a referee as to pursuer's conduct at a football match between members of two clubs belonging to the Union, in which the pursuer was a player, arranged for a meeting of committee to inquire into the complaint, that it was ultra vires of the committee to hold such an inquiry, that the meeting was attended by the members of committee called as defenders individually, that the committee so composed adopted a finding that the pursuer had used offensive language to the referee, and passed a resolution that he should be severely censured and ordered to apologise to the referee, and that the finding and resolution were published in certain newspapers containing football intelligence throughout Scotland upon the instruction of the members of committee who attended the meeting. The pursuer also made averments to the effect that the inquiry had been conducted in an unfair and irregular manner. Held (1) that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue against the Union and its committee as representing it, the ground of his complaint being that the committee had acted outwith the authority of the Union; and (2) that the pursuer was entitled to an issue of slander against the members of the committee individually, and that having regard to the averments as to the publication in newspapers, and to the conduct of the inquiry, the pursuer's record did not necessarily imply privilege, and that it must be left to the presiding Judge, after hearing the evidence, to direct the jury whether the defenders were privileged. Form of issue approved. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 449.

Slander—Privilege—Report of railway inspector to superiors—Motion for new trial—Credibility—Evidence to support verdict.

12. A railway inspector lodged a report with the traffic superintendent stating that he had detected, in a goods shed, a railway clerk using a gimlet in the side of a cask, and a railway porter sitting on the cask with a water can in his hands, that he had said to them that they were in a very awkward position, and that the clerk said they were, while the porter followed him and asked if he intended to report the matter. The clerk and the porter raised an action of damages for slander against the inspector, and obtained an issue which contained malice. At the trial the pursuers, who had also been for some time in the employment of the company, deponed that the whole report was an invention, but they offered no explanation of the defender's motive in making the charge against them. The jury having returned a verdict for the pursuers, and awarded £100 to each as damages, the Court refused to grant a new trial, on the ground that the question was one of credibility, and that if the jury believed the evidence for the pursuers the false report by the defender was sufficient evidence of malice to warrant the verdict returned. Martin and Stark v. Cruickshanks, June 26, 1896, p. 874.

Slander—Innuendo—Issue—Counter Issue—Veritas—Evidence competent to defender without counter issue.

13. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer obtained an issue whether the defender falsely and calumniously stated that a clause in an agreement between a client of the pursuer and the Police Commissioners of a burgh had been added by the pursuer to the agreement after its execution by the Commissioners, meaning thereby that the clause had been fraudulently interpolated in the agreement by the pursuer after execution. The defender admitted that he had made the statement, and stated that it was true, but denied the innuendo. At the trial the defender proposed to adduce evidence to shew that the clause was added after execution by the Commissioners, but the evidence was disallowed by the presiding Judge, on the ground that it was an attempt to prove veritas without a counter issue. In a bill of exceptions, held that the evidence was competent as tendered to prove a fact relevant to the defence. Henderson v. Russell, Oct. 22, 1895, p. 25.

Slander—Issue—Counter Issue.

14. In an action of damages for alleged slander contained in two leaflets issued by the defender, the pursuer averred that the leaflets falsely and calumniously represented him to be a dishonest and disreputable person, but only proposed to put in issue certain specific charges of dishonesty out of various charges which the leaflets contained. The defender pleaded veritas, averred a number of instances, in which he alleged the pursuer to have acted dishonestly, and proposed issues in justification. Held (1) that the pursuer was entitled to limit his issues to certain of the specific charges of dishonesty contained in the leaflets, although these were only given in illustration of the general attack on his character; and (2) that the counter issues must be limited to these specific charges. Powell v. Long, Feb. 25, 1896, p. 534.

Sporting Association—Suspended from playing football—Patrimonial loss.

15. Held that a resolution of a football union suspending a member of a club belonging to the union from playing did not entitle the member to an issue that the resolution had been "wrongfully, incompetently, and unwarrantably passed and caused to be published by the committee to his loss, injury, and damage," in respect that the alleged resolution was not one which affected any question of property or patrimonial interest, the appropriate issue, so far as the resolution affected reputation, being an issue of slander. Murdison v. Scottish Football Union, Jan. 30, 1896, p. 449.

Wrongous Interdict.

16. In an action of damages raised by the liquidator of a bleaching company, the pursuer stated that he had advertised a sale by auction of a large number of articles belonging to the bleachwork; that the defender, who had already bought the machinery of the bleachwork and other articles on the day before the sale, wrongfully obtained interim interdict against the sale proceeding; that of 266 articles included in the inventory prepared for the sale nine only were ultimately ascertained to belong to the defender, and that the interdict was unwarrantable quoad the articles belonging to the pursuer. The defender pleaded that the action was not relevant, in respect that in the circumstances set forth by the pursuer the defender was entitled to stop the sale until his rights should be ascertained. Held that the action was relevant. Fife v. Orr, Oct. 16, 1895, p. 8.

Wrongous appointment of judicial manager of farm.

17. Appointment of judicial manager of farm on ex parte statements by landlord as to farm having been deserted by tenant. Question whether in event of statements being erroneous, bona fides of landlord a relevant defence to action of damages by tenant against him. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

Wrongous use of diligence—Sequestration—Judicial Factor—Opening lockfast place.

18. The wife of a bankrupt brought an action of damages against a person who had been appointed judicial factor upon the sequestrated estate of her husband under section 16 of the Bankruptcy Act, averring that the defender, while taking an inventory of the effects in the house tenanted by her husband, had wrongfully and without warrant forced open the door of a room which was locked and examined the effects therein, although informed that the effects in that room belonged entirely to the pursuer. Held that the action was irrelevant. M'Lachlan v. Bell, Nov. 20, 1895, p. 126.

Compulsory powers—Mines and Minerals—Misappropriation of freestone—Measure of damages.

19. A railway company having wrongously excavated certain freestone reserved to their superiors, held that the superiors were entitled to recover from the company the market value of the freestone used or removed by them, less the cost of working, although it appeared that

Opinion of Court on point not debated or determined by interlocutor.
2. The opinion of the Court, expressed at advising, on a question not argued by the parties, and not referred to in the interlocutor of the Court, held not to foreclose the parties from subsequently raising the question for judgment. Moubray's Trustees v. Moubray, June 16, 1896, p. 809.

RETENTION. Executor—Compensation—Mutuality of debt and credit—Bank—Claim of bank to retain against debt of deceased customer funds lodged by his executors.
1. Held that a bank to whom a debt was owing by a deceased customer, whose estate was found to be insolvent, was not entitled to withhold payment of sums lodged with the bank by his executors either on the plea of retention or of compensation. Gray's Trustees v. Royal Bank, Nov. 27, 1895, p. 199.
Factor's right of retention—Right in security—Effect of assignation to rents in bond and disposition in security where bondholder has not raised an action of maills and duties.
2. Held that factors who had been authorised by their principal to collect and retain rents in repayment of advances made by them to him were entitled to retain the rents in competition with creditors who held bonds over the property duly recorded, and containing assignations to rents in ordinary form, but who had not brought an action of maills and duties against the tenants. Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist v. Dawson, Feb. 5, 1896, p. 496.
Factor's right of retention—Bankruptcy—Retrocession of bankrupt.
3. A, the proprietor of heritage, appointed a firm of house factors to be factors of his property, and authorised them to retain the rents which they collected in repayment of an advance which they had made to him on his acceptance. Subsequently a petition for sequestration of A's estates was presented three days before the term of Martinmas, and the first deliverance was pronounced on the same day. At Martinmas the factors uplifted the rents and retained them in repayment of their advance. The trustee who was appointed on A's sequestrated estates made no objection to the retention of the rents by the factors, and they lodged no claim in the sequestration. A having thereafter been discharged on a composition, and retrocessed in his estates, claimed the rents retained by the factors on the ground that it was property falling under the sequestration which belonged to him in virtue of his retrocession. Held that the factors were entitled to retain the rents claimed. Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist v. Dawson, Feb. 5, 1896, p. 496.
Company—Minute-book of Company.
4. Held that a person who had been secretary of a company prior to its liquidation had no right of retention or lien over its minute-book for a debt due to him by the company. Gladstone v. M'Callum, June 16, 1896, p. 783.

REVENUE. Income-tax—Interest on colonial investments—Income-Tax Act, 1842—Schedule D, Case 4, sec. 102—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893, sec. 5.

1. The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1893, imposed income-tax for the year 1893-4 upon income chargeable under Schedules A, B, C, D, and E of the Income-Tax Act, 1853, and enacted that provisions in any Income-Tax Act in force in the previous year should have full force and effect "with respect to the duties of income-tax hereby granted." An insurance society was assessed for income-tax for the year 1893-94 on the interest of colonial investments not received in Great Britain, but received and re-invested in the colonies, on the ground that it was subject to assessment under sec. 102 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842. Held (1) that if and in so far as sec. 102 of the Act of 1842 subjected to assessment income not covered by the lettered schedules, it was not in force for the year 1893-94; and (2) that sec. 102 did not impose duties, but merely contained provisions as to the duties granted in the schedules. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution, Dec. 17, 1895, p. 322.

Income-tax—Interest on colonial investments—Constructive remittance—Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, Case 4.

2. Where interest derived from the colonial investments of a society for mutual insurance was not remitted home, but was re-invested abroad, held that it was not constructively remitted to this country by being entered in the society's accounts so as to be chargeable with duty under Case 4 of Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842. Inland Revenue v. Scottish Provident Institution, Dec. 17, 1895, p. 322.

Income-Tax—Profits arising from Trade—Trade carried on by Religious Society—Deductions—Losses not connected with Trade—Income-Tax Act, 1853, sec. 2, Schedule D—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 100, Schedule D, Case 1, Rule 3.

3. A society whose object was to promote religion by the circulation of tracts and books, carried on the business of booksellers in a shop, and earned profits therefrom. The Society also sold books by colporteurs, but the colportage work could not by itself be carried on at a profit as a commercial undertaking, and the society was able to continue it only by means of the profits earned in the shop and of voluntary subscriptions. Held that the profits earned in carrying on the business of booksellers were trade profits and fell to be assessed for income-tax, and that the losses arising from the colportage agencies did not fall to be deducted therefrom, the colportage being essentially distinct from the bookselling business, and not being of the nature of trade. Religious Tract and Book Society v. Inland Revenue, Jan. 14, 1896, p. 390.

Excise—Licence to carry armorial bearings—Customs and Inland Revenue Duties Act, 1869, sec. 19, subsec. 13.

4. Held that a device upon a ring consisting of a shield charged with a crowned lion rampant was an armorial bearing in the sense of subsec. 13 of sec. 19 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Duties Act, 1869. Milligan v. Cowan, May 16, 1896, p. 731.

RIGHT IN SECURITY. Catholic Security—Contribution of separate estates to common burden—Annuity.

1. Where two heritable estates, which were both subject to the common burden of an annuity, passed into the possession of separate proprietors, held, in a question between these proprietors, that each estate was bound to contribute to the annuity from year to year, in proportion to the amount of its free rental after deduction of the interest on prior burdens. Ferrier v. Cowan, March 20, 1896, p. 703.

Bond and Disposition in Security—Retention—Factor's right of retention—Effect of assignation to rents in bond and disposition in security where bondholder has not raised an action of maills and duties.

2. Held that factors who had been authorised by their principal to collect and retain rents in repayment of advances made by them to him were entitled to retain the rents in competition with creditors who held bonds over the property duly recorded, and containing assignations to rents in ordinary form, but who had not brought an action of maills and duties against the tenants. Stevenson, Lauder, & Gilchrist v. Dawson, Feb. 5, 1896, p. 496.

Bond and Disposition in Security—Registered Bond and Assignation in Security of long lease—Poinding of the ground—Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 4.

3. Held that the creditor under a bond and assignation of a ninety-nine years' lease duly recorded in terms of the Registration of Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, was not entitled to warrant for poinding of the ground. Luke v. Wallace, March 13, 1896, p. 634.

Bond and Disposition in Security of Superiority—Right of bondholder to sue action of Maills and Duties.

4. Held that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security of a superiority, with an assignation to feu-duties and casualties, has no title to sue an action of maills and duties against the vassal of his debtor for recovery of the feu-duties. Nelson's Trustees v. Tod, July 9, 1896, p. 1000.

Bond and Disposition in Security—Sale by owner of burdened house—Right of bondholder to enforce sale.

5. Opinion (per Lord Young) that a bondholder cannot enforce implement of a sale made by the owner of the burdened subjects. Smith v. Soeder, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 60.

Bond and disposition in security reserving power to feu security subjects—Feu of part of subjects under building restrictions and disburdening subjects feued of bond—Whether disponee from bondholder, who had sold unfeued subjects under powers of sale, bound by restrictions.

6. In 1871 Harper, the proprietor of an area of unbuilt-on ground in Glasgow granted a bond and disposition in security over the ground, reserving power to feu the same, it being declared that the superiority of the lands feued should be subject to the security. Thereafter Harper feued out part of the ground under building restrictions, and bound himself to take the feuars in the unfeued plots bound to conform to these restrictions, which were declared to be essential qualifications of the feu-contract and real liens and burdens upon the plots thereby disponed, and in so far as declared in favour of the vassal, a real lien and burden on the remainder of the ground. Buildings were erected on the plots feued in conformity with the feu-contracts. Subsequently the superiorities of the plots feued were sold with the consent of the bondholder, and the security was restricted to the unfeued ground. In 1894 the bondholder, under the powers in his bond, sold the unfeued ground and the purchasers having proposed to erect on the ground houses which were disconform to the restrictions, the proprietors of the feus granted by Harper brought an action against the purchasers of the unfeued ground to have it declared that the ground was subject to the building restrictions and conditions contained in Harper's feu-contracts. The pursuers averred that the defenders were at the time they purchased the unfeued ground aware of these conditions and restrictions. The Court assoilzied the defenders, holding (1) that as the defenders had not acquired the superiorities of the feus granted by Harper they were not liable in the personal obligations undertaken by him to the feuars; (2) that the personal obligations undertaken by Harper to the feuars after he had granted the bond with power of sale could not affect the right of the bondholder or of his successors in the unfeued ground; (3) that the restrictions had not validly been made real burdens on the unfeued ground, as they did not enter the titles thereof; (4) that the feu-contracts granted by Harper could not create a servitude altius non tollendi over the unfeued ground, in respect that there was no separate and distinct condition as to height, although a limitation as to height might be inferred from the conditions of the feu-contracts as a whole; (5) that assuming the defenders to have been in the knowledge of the conditions in Harper's feu-contracts, they were not thereby barred from erecting buildings inconsistent with these conditions. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 67.

Bond and Disposition in Security—Limitation of heir's liability for ancestor's debts—Transmission to heir of personal obligation in heritable bond over heritage—Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, secs. 12 and 47.

7. A, who was personally liable under bonds affecting his heritable estate for payment of the sums thereby secured, died leaving a disposition and settlement, whereby he disponed his whole estate, real and personal, to B, whom he appointed his executor and universal legatee. Held that under secs. 12 and 47 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, the personal obligation contained in the bonds transmitted against B, but that his liability for the debts of the deceased (including the bonds) was limited to the value of the estate to which he succeeded. ROAD. Action to negative alleged right of way—Sist to give County Council opportunity to intervene—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 42.

1. The proprietor of an estate brought an action against R., concluding for declarator that he held the estate free of any public right of way over a certain part of it, and for interdict against the defender entering upon it. R., who had used a path over the part of the estate in question for sixteen years, lodged defences. The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof. Shortly before the diet fixed for proof the defender moved the Lord Ordinary to sist the action, upon the ground that, his funds being exhausted, he was unable to make the necessary preparations for the proof, and that the case was being considered by the County Council, who were entitled under the Local Government Act, 1894, to take steps to vindicate rights of way. The Lord Ordinary refused the motion, and the defender having failed to appear at the proof the Lord Ordinary granted decree as against R. as concluded for. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and sisted the action hoc statu upon an undertaking by the defender not to use the path during the sist. Alston v. Ross, Dec. 12, 1895, p. 273.

1. In an action to enforce implement of an improbative offer for the sale of heritage, which had been accepted, the pursuer averred that before accepting the offer he had in the knowledge of the offerer incurred considerable expense and trouble in investigating the value of the heritage, and in endeavouring to form a syndicate for its purchase. He pleaded that the offer was validated rei interventu. Held that the averments were irrelevant. Mowat v. Caledonian Banking Co., Limited, Dec. 11, 1895, p. 270.

Sale of heritage—Sale by auction—Essential error—Implement in knowledge of ground of challenge—Personal objection—Private knowledge of prior right.

2. Two contiguous properties within a burgh belonging to Morison's trustees, held under different titles, were exposed for sale by public roup as lot No. 1 and lot No. 2. The articles of roup described the lots by their respective descriptions in the titles, but as Morison's trustees intended to sell as part of lot No. 1 certain back buildings which were within the description in the titles of lot No. 2, but were occupied in connection with lot No. 1, the following marginal addition was made to the description of lot No. 1 in the articles, "as the said subjects are presently occupied and possessed by" the persons then in occupation of lot No. 1 and of the back buildings. This marginal addition was not referred to in the testing-clause, and no corresponding addition was made to the description of lot No. 2 in the articles. At the roup lot No. 1 was knocked down first—to Lawrie—but one of the instrumentary witnesses never signed the minute of enactment in his favour. Lot No. 2 was knocked down to Moncrieff, in whose favour a minute of enactment was duly executed. Moncrieff, after the sale, claimed a conveyance including the back ground and buildings, as falling within the description of the subjects sold to him. Morison's trustees at first objected, but subsequently granted a conveyance in his favour of lot No. 2 as described in the articles, without any qualification. This conveyance was delivered and recorded before the conveyance to Lawrie of lot No. 1, which was described in that conveyance as in the articles with the marginal addition. Lawrie having entered into possession of the back ground and buildings, Moncrieff brought an action against him for declarator of property and for removing. Morison's trustees having been sisted as defenders along with Lawrie, the defenders maintained that they ought to be assoilzied on the ground that Morison's trustees were, to the knowledge of the pursuer, at the time of the sale under essential error as to the extent of the subjects sold as lot No. 2; and the defender Lawrie further maintained that he ought to be assoilzied on the ground that a sale of the back subjects to him had, to the knowledge of the pursuer, been completed prior to the sale of lot No. 2. The Lord Ordinary after a proof granted decree in favour of the pursuer, holding (1) that it was not open, either to Morison's trustees or to Lawrie, to plead essential error on the part of Morison's trustees after Morison's trustees had granted an unqualified conveyance to the pursuer in the knowledge that he claimed the back subjects; and (2) that the special defence maintained by Lawrie was ill founded, no prior contract of sale having been completed, owing to the absence of the signature of the instrumentary witness to the minute. On a reclaiming note the Court adhered, but on the ground that, as the titles stood, the buildings in question must be held to belong to the pursuer and not to Lawrie. Moncrieff v. Lawrie, March 6, 1896, p. 577.

Sale of heritage—Urban tenement—Objection to title—Restrictions—Failure of seller to disclose restrictions.

3. A seller, who acted through an agent, exchanged missives of sale of an urban property with a purchaser who had not the advice of an agent. After the completion of the sale the purchaser sent the titles to his agent, who informed him that the property was subject to restrictions whereby dwelling-houses only could be built on the site, windows in the back wall of the upper storey were forbidden, and a passage must be left for access to premises at the back. The purchaser then intimated to the seller that he renounced the sale. Held that as the restrictions were not disclosed to the purchaser at the time of the sale, he was entitled, when they came to his knowledge, to renounce. Smith v. Soeder, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 60.

Sale of heritage—Sale by owner of burdened house—Right of bondholder to enforce sale.

4. Opinion (per Lord Young) that a bondholder cannot enforce implement of a sale made by the owner of the burdened subjects. Smith v. Soeder, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 60.

Sale of moveables—Constitution—Cautioner.

5. B, a builder, in the course of erecting certain houses became unable to get building materials on his own credit and applied to S. S carried on the work, employing B as a servant and paying him wages, and also paying for materials which B ordered. S informed C & Co. of the arrangement and promised to see them paid for any materials supplied to B's order. Held that C & Co. had a claim against S as buyer of the goods. Stevenson's Trustee v. Campbell & Sons, March 20, 1896, p. 711.

Sale of moveables—Construction—Trade Discount—Executory Contract—Notice—Invoice.

6. A brewer entered into a verbal agreement with a retail dealer to supply him with beer, and allow him 35 per cent discount when he paid an account. No arrangement was made as to the length of credit to be allowed, but with each consignment of beer an invoice was sent, on which was a printed notice which stated that accounts not paid within three months were not subject to discount. The attention of the dealer was not specially called to the terms of the invoices, and on more than one occasion during a course of dealing extending over two years, the dealer was allowed the usual discount upon accounts not paid within three months. In an action by the brewer for payment of the full amount of an account not paid within three months, held that by the original contract between the parties the price of the beer was fixed at 65 per cent of the nominal price; that this contract was not qualified by the terms of the invoices, and therefore that the defender was only liable for the amount of the account after deduction of 35 per cent. Sale of moveables—Warranty—Proof of warranty—Horse—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 14.

8. Circumstances in which held that an oral statement, by a dealer in horses to a purchaser, who said that he wished to buy a horse quiet to ride and drive, that a horse was quiet to ride and drive did not imply a warranty. Wilson v. Turnbull & Co., May 12, 1896, p. 714.

Sale of moveables—Warranty—Horse.

9. The purchaser of a horse the second day after he received it rejected it on the ground that it had been warranted quiet to ride and drive, and that it was disconform to warranty. It appeared that on the day after it had been put in the purchaser's stable it had been tried in the saddle by the purchaser and had given satisfaction, that on the following day the purchaser drove it in a dogcart along a road new to it, and that on coming near a bridge over a railway it was scared by the steam of a train which it could not see; that it then reared and turned round and refused to proceed. Opinion, per cur., that even if the warranty were proved the conduct of the horse in the exceptional circumstances in which it was placed did not shew that it was not quiet to drive, and that the purchaser was not entitled to reject it without further trial. Wilson v. Turnbull & Co., May 12, 1896, p. 714.

Sale of moveables—Sale of second-hand machinery—Disconformity to description—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sec. 11, subsec. 2, and sec. 13.

Sale of medical practice, including book debts—Construction—Specialia derogant generalibus.

11. A firm of medical practitioners was dissolved by the death of one of the partners on 15th April 1894. On 21st July 1894 his widow and executrix agreed to sell to the assistant of the late firm "the deceased's whole right and interest in the practice carried on" by the firm, "consisting of (first) the deceased's share, right, and interest in the horses, harness, machines, and others"; (second) his share in the medical and surgical instruments and books; and (third) "the deceased's share, right, and interest in the book debts, including the goodwill of the business belonging to the firm," for £485, the purchaser undertaking to free and relieve the seller and the representatives of the deceased "of all debts and obligations due by the said firm . . . in any manner of way whatsoever." Held that the sale embraced the deceased's whole interest in the assets of the firm, including not merely the book debts outstanding at the date of the agreement, but all fees received by the firm since the last division of profits on 31st January 1894. Alexander v. Alexander, May 13, 1896, p. 724.

Mortgage over ship—Agreement for repayments out of profits—Specific appropriation—Breach of trust.
A offered to advance to a shipping company £15,000 on a mortgage over a steam vessel, "on condition that all profits earned by the steamer to be paid to us towards reducing the loan till the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000." The managing committee of the company agreed to accept the offer, subject to the modification "that instead of all the profits being paid to A till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then." A agreed to the modification, and the arrangement was approved by the company. Subsequently the advance was made, and the mortgage granted. The company went into liquidation. Held that the agreement imported merely a personal obligation by the company to pay to A £2000 per annum from profits, and that A had no preference over the profits. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel, Nov. 7, 1895, p. 84.
ill of Lading—Short delivery—Proof—Onus.
In an action by a shipowner for payment of freight the defenders claimed to retain the value of twelve bales of jute short delivered of the quantity specified in the bills of lading. The pursuer in reply stated that he had delivered the whole quantity received on board the vessel, and denied further liability. Held, after a proof (rev. judgment of Second Division), that having regard to the way in which the delivery of the goods had been checked by the ship's officers, and the receipt acknowledged in the bill of lading, the evidence led by the shipowner was not sufficient to shew that the twelve bales had not been put on board the vessel, and that he was responsible for the quantity specified in the bills of lading. Smith & Co. v. On 17th October the shipowner wrote to the charterers that the "River Ettrick" had left for Bo'ness, and asked them to supply a cargo for the 19th. The Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Interdict—Patent.

2. A paint manufacturer in Aberdeen brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against a paint merchant there, to have him interdicted from making, using, and selling a paint which the pursuer alleged was an infringement of a patent which he had taken out. After the action was raised a paint manufacturer in Birmingham craved to be sisted as a defender, on the ground that he was the manufacturer of the paint sold by the defender, and thus had the real interest in defending the action. The Birmingham manufacturer was sisted accordingly. Thereafter the original defender withdrew from the action, interdict being pronounced against him, of consent and with the concurrence of the Birmingham manufacturer, and a record was made up between the pursuers and the Birmingham manufacturer, in which the latter raised the question of the validity of the pursuers' patent. After a proof, the Sheriff affirmed the validity of the patent, and granted interdict against the Birmingham manufacturer. In an appeal, held that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to pronounce this interlocutor. Gill v. Cutler, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 371.

Jurisdiction—Judicial Factor—Desertion of farm—Appointment of manager.

4. A decree by a Sheriff-substitute appointing a petitioner executor-dative proceeded on the statement that the respondent had withdrawn her opposition. In an appeal by the respondent, the appellant stated that the Sheriff-substitute was mistaken in supposing that she had withdrawn her opposition, and asked for a proof on that point. The Court proposed in the first instance to remit to the Sheriff-substitute for a report, and the appellant having objected to this course, refused the appeal. Whyte v. Whyte, Dec. 17, 1895, p. 320.

Process—Citation—Edictal Citation—Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 9.

5. The Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 9, enacts that "the Sheriff Clerk shall, in all warrants to cite or charge persons furth of Scotland, insert a warrant to cite or charge edictally." A landlord presented a petition in the Sheriff Court for the appointment of a manager upon a farm, alleging that the tenant had deserted the farm and gone to America. The warrant of citation contained no warrant to cite the respondent edictally, and the petition was served by leaving a copy at the farm-house, where his family continued to reside. No appearance having been entered for the tenant, the petition was granted. The tenant, who returned to this country within a month, brought an action of reduction of the appointment of the manager on the ground, inter alia, that there had been no edictal citation. In the action he averred that he had been only temporarily absent from the farm. The Court repelled the plea, on the ground that if the defender's absence was temporary edictal citation was not necessary. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

tion dated 1st September, requiring the defender to lodge a notice of appearance "within forty-eight hours after the date of this my citation"; the execution returned upon the petition bore that it was served upon the 31st August; and the Sheriff pronounced decree in absence on 3d September. In a reduction of the execution, held that in the absence of other contradictory evidence than the service copy of the petition, with the citation thereon, the date of the execution fell to be taken as the date of service, and that the inducia fell to be reckoned therefrom. Gibson v. Clark, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 294.

Reduction of Sheriff Court Decree—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 64-67—Act of Sederunt, March 10, 1870, sec. 3, subsec. 5.

7. Held (by Lord Kincairney and acquiescod in) (1) that the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1868, had not rendered an action for reduction of an extracted Sheriff Court decree incompetent; and (2) that it was not incompetent to include in such action of reduction conclusions additional to those contained in the Sheriff Court process for the purpose of more clearly elucidating the rights of parties. Taylor's Trustees v. M'Gavigan, July 3, 1896, p. 945.

SHIP. Mortgage over ship—Agreement for repayments out of profits—Specific appropriation—Breach of trust.

1. A offered to advance to a shipping company £15,000 on a mortgage over a steam vessel, "on condition that all profits earned by the steamer to be paid to us towards reducing the loan till the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000." The managing committee of the company agreed to accept the offer, subject to the modification "that instead of all the profits being paid to A till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then." A agreed to the modification, and the arrangement was approved by the company. Subsequently the advance was made, and the mortgage granted. The company went into liquidation. Held that the agreement imported merely a personal obligation by the company to pay to A £2000 per annum from profits, and that A had no preference over the profits. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel, Nov. 7, 1895, p. 84.

Bill of Lading—Short delivery—Proof—Onus.

2. In an action by a shipowner for payment of freight the defenders claimed to retain the value of twelve bales of jute short delivered of the quantity specified in the bills of lading. The pursuer in reply stated that he had delivered the whole quantity received on board the vessel, and denied further liability. Held, after a proof (rev. judgment of Second Division), that having regard to the way in which the delivery of the goods had been checked by the ship's officers, and the receipt acknowledged in the bill of lading, the evidence led by the shipowner was not sufficient to shew that the twelve bales had not been put on board the vessel, and that he was responsible for the quantity specified in the bills of lading. Smith & Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Co., Limited, Nov. 26, 1895, H. L., p. 1.

Charter-party—Delay in providing cargo.

3. A charter-party provided that the s.s. "River Ettrick" should proceed to Bo'ness and receive a cargo, to be brought alongside within sixty running hours, and that demurrage should be paid at a specified rate, "lay-days to count from the time the master has got ship reported berthed and ready to receive or deliver cargo, and given notice of the same in writing to charterers or their agents during business hours." On 17th October the shipowner wrote to the charterers that the "River Ettrick" had left for Bo'ness, and asked them to supply a cargo for the 19th. The

"River Ettrick" arrived in Bo'ness roads on the 19th, but in consequence of the crowded state of the dock she was not allowed to enter. On the 21st October a loading berth became vacant, as cargoes were not ready for certain vessels which had arrived before the "River Ettrick." If a cargo had been ready for the "River Ettrick," she would have been allowed to enter the dock and would have got this berth, but as no cargo was ready she was not allowed to enter the dock. She was docked on the 26th, berthed for loading on the 27th, and sailed on the 28th October. The shipowners sued the charterers for demurrage or damages, alleging that a delay of ninety-four hours had been caused by the fault of the defenders, in not having a cargo ready on 21st October. The Second Division assoilzied the defenders, finding that the vessel arrived in Bo'ness Roads on 19th October, but was not able, and was not allowed, to enter the dock on account of the crowded state of the dock until the 26th October . . . that the "River Ettrick" did not arrive at her charter port of shipment, and that the lay-days did not begin to run, until the said 26th October, when the "River Ettrick" got into dock, and that the defenders were not liable in demurrage. There was no finding in fact that there was a berth vacant on 21st October, and that the vessel would have been allowed to enter the dock on that day if a cargo had been ready, but it was mentioned in the opinion of the Court in delivering judgment. In an appeal brought by the pursuer he contended that as the Court had not in their findings given all the facts proved material to his claim for damages, there should be a remit to have the defect supplied. Held, without determining whether the findings in fact excluded a remit, that there was no rule of law requiring a shipper in every port and in all circumstances to have a cargo ready to meet the unexpected contingency of a berth being open to a vessel out of its regular turn, and therefore that the fact founded on was not material, and judgment affirmed. Little v. Stevenson & Co., March 19, 1896, H. L., p. 12.

Charter-party—Agreement by owner to insure—Risk—Owner and charterer—Collision—Relief—Maritime lien.

4. A steam-trawler was hired out by her owner under a time charter, whereby the charterer was to find crew, stores, &c., and the owner was "to pay insurance only." The owner, inter alia, insured against loss from having to pay damages for injury which might be caused by the trawler to other vessels with the exception of one-fifth of three-fourths of such loss. The trawler, through the fault of the charterer's crew, caused damage to another vessel, and the owner of the trawler, without notice to the charterer, settled the claim, and was reimbursed by the insurance company to the extent of his insurance. In an action raised by the owner against the charterer for the balance of loss, held that as the pursuer had settled the claim without notice to the defender, he had no right of relief against him on the ground that it had been caused by his fault. 1. Where a private partnership conveyed its whole assets to a joint stock company limited by shares, consisting exclusively of the same partners, in consideration of each partner getting shares in the new company equal in value to his holding in the old partnership, held that the conveyance was a conveyance on sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and that the disposition was chargeable with ad valorem

SUCCESSION. Heir's liability—Limitation of liability for ancestor's debts—Transmission to heir of personal obligation in heritable bond over heritage—Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874, secs. 12 and 47.
1. A, who was personally liable under bonds affecting his heritable estate for payment of the sums thereby secured, died leaving a disposition and settlement, whereby he disponed his whole estate, real and personal, to B, whom he appointed his executor and universal legatee. Held that under the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, secs. 12 and 47, the personal obligation contained in the bonds transmitted against B, but that his liability for the debts of the deceased (including the bonds) was limited to the value of the estate to which he succeeded. Welch's Executors v. Edinburgh Life Assurance Co., May 29, 1896, p. 772.

Heir's liability—Passive Title—Lease excluding assignees.
2. A nineteen years' lease of an urban subject was granted to a tenant and his heirs, but excluding assignees and subtenants without the consent of the lessor. On the death of the tenant, his heir took up the lease. Held that the heir did not incur passive representation for the debts of his predecessor, in respect that he took the lease, not as representing his ancestor, but in his own right under the lease. Bain v. Mackenzie, Feb. 25, 1896, p. 528.

Collation—Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855, sec. 2.
3. An intestate, leaving heritable and moveable estate, was survived by an aunt, his sole next of kin, and was predeceased by his uncle, who, had he survived, would have been his heir in heritage and one of his next of kin. Held that the only child of the uncle being heir in heritage of the intestate, was entitled under sec. 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, to call upon the next of kin to collate, although in consequence of the proviso in sec. 1 of that Act she would not have been entitled under that section to a share of the moveable estate. Jamieson v. Walker, March 4, 1896, p. 547.

Implied direction to accumulate—Thellusson Act—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Intestacy.

4. A testator directed his trustees upon the death of the last of certain annuitants to "realise and convert into cash" his whole estate, and "divide" the residue among certain persons who until that event were to have no vested right. The surplus revenue was accumulated in the hands of the trustees. At the expiry of twenty-one years from the testator's death two of the annuitants still survived. Held (1) (foll. Lord v. Colvin, Dec. 7, 1860, 23 D. 111) that there was an implied direction to the trustees to accumulate the surplus income; (2) that further accumulations being prohibited by the Thellusson Act, and no one having a vested right to residue, the surplus income as it accrued fell to the testator's heirs ab intestato; (3) (foll. Thomas v. Tennent's Trustees, Nov. 17, 1868, 7 Macph. 114, and Cowan v. Cowan, March 19, 1887, 14 R. 670), that the direction to "realise" when the date of division arrived did not operate conversion of the heritage prior to that date; (4) (foll. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, June 30, 1891, 18 R. 992, diss. Lord Adam), that the rents of each term as they accrued fell to the person holding at that time the character of heir-at-law of the testator; and (5) that the rents accumulated in the hands of the trustees before the expiry of the twenty-one years being moveable estate, the surplus income derived therefrom fell to the heirs in mobilibus of the testator as at the date of his death. Logan's Trustees v. Logan, June 24, 1896, p. 848.

Heritable and Moveable—Collation between heir and executor—Thellusson Act, cap. 98.

5. Where by the operation of the Thellusson Act the rents of a testator's heritage fell as they accrued to his heir-at-law at the time, and the income of his moveable estate to his next of kin, and where the heir-at-law was one of the next of kin, held that the heir-at-law was entitled to a share of the income of the moveable estate without collating. Logan's Trustees v. Logan, June 24, 1896, p. 848.

Heritable and Moveable—Deed of Acknowledgment—Jus relictæ—Act 1661, c. 32.

6. An acknowledgment for a sum of money was granted in the following terms:—"Received from Mr Michael Dawson . . . the sum of £5000 stg. as a deposit for mission purposes, to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, payable half-yearly at Martinmas and Whitsunday, and to be repaid on three months' notice." After Mr Dawson's death, held in a question between his widow and his testamentary trustees that the sum of £5000 was heritable as regarded jus relictæ. Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson, July 9, 1896, p. 1006.

Legitim—Heritable Bond.

7. Held that when a man leaves a widow and children, and part of his estate consists of a bond which is heritable quoad jus relictæ, and moveable quoad legitim, the children are entitled to one-half of the fund as legitim. Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson, July 9, 1896, p. 1006.

Legitim—Provision to children and issue of children—Clause of forfeiture—Revocation of provision in favour of one of children—Claim for and receipt of legitim by that child—Effect on provision for issue of child.

8. A testator directed his trustees to hold and convey one-fourth of the residue of his estate for behoof of his son John in liferent, and John's children in fee, and made similar provisions in favour of his sons Thomas and George, and their children, and provided the remaining one-fourth part to the children of his deceased son James. The settlement contained this declaration,—"Declaring that in the event of any of my said sons or their descendants repudiating this settlement, or by any means preventing it from taking effect in whole or in part, then such sons, as well as their descendants, shall forfeit their whole right and interest in those portions of my means and estate that I am entitled to dispose of, which right and interest shall in that event accresce and belong to such of my sons, the said John, Thomas, and George, and their descendants, and the descendants of my son James, as shall abide by this settlement and accept of the provisions herein contained." By codicil the testator revoked the liferent provision of one-fourth share in favour of his son John, and instead directed his trustees to hold and apply the said share for behoof of John's children, "and with this alteration I confirm the said trust-disposition and settlement in every respect." John claimed and received payment of legitim. In competition between John's children and the surviving descendants of the testator other than John and his children, held that the right to the portion of the trust-estate bequeathed to John's children by the trust-disposition and codicil had not been forfeited by John having claimed and received payment of his legitim. Urie's Trustees v. Urie, June 24, 1896, p. 865.

Legitim—Interest.

9. Where a son raised an action for payment of legitim thirteen years after his father's death, and election could not, owing to the son's minority, have been made at an earlier date, the Court held that the father's executrix was only liable in interest on the son's legitim at the rate which the money would have earned under prudent administration, and found her liable in interest at the rate of 4 per cent, that being the rate which the estate was admitted to have earned. Ross v. Ross, June 16, 1896, p. 802.

Testament—Construction—"Heirs-female."

10. A truster, "in order to make and secure additional provision for" his second son and the other heirs of entail succeeding him in the lands and estates of Cromartie . . . to enable them to support the dignity and title of Earl of Cromartie," conveyed to trustees certain securities, and directed them, after his death, to pay the free proceeds thereof to his second son and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to certain substitutes, "whom failing to the heirs-female of the body" of the said second son. The second son, the Earl of Cromartie, died leaving only two daughters, of whom the elder succeeded her father in the title and estates of Cromartie. Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the direction to the trustees to pay the income to the "heirs-female" of the body of the second son being unambiguous, must receive effect, and that, as the two daughters were heirs-portioners, each was entitled to one-half of the income of the trust funds. Mackenzie v. Duke of Devonshire, May 15, 1896, H. L., p. 32.

Testament—Construction—Words importing gift of heritage.

11. A testator left the estate of N to his nephew, and after various legacies he provided as follows:—"I leave as my residuary legatee my niece Annie Amelia Wallace, who will pay my funeral expenses and any debts I may justly owe." The nephew died six months before the testator, who was aware of his death, but made no alteration on his will. Held that the estate of N was carried by the residuary clause. Wallace's Executors v. Wallace, Nov. 21, 1895, p. 142.

Fee and Liferent—Destination to spouses in conjunct fee and to the survivor in fee.

12. A lease for ninety-nine years was assigned to spouses "in conjunct fee and to the survivor of them in fee." Held that the fee vested in the spouses jointly, with the benefit of survivorship. Walker v. Galbraith, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 347.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

Special Destination—General Settlement.

13. A long lease of heritage was assigned to D. D. and M. D., his wife, "in conjunct fee, and to the survivor of them in fee, and at the death of the survivor to the heirs of the said D. D. and M. D., equally between them." The spouses subsequently executed a mutual settlement, by which they conveyed to the survivor of them in liferent for his or her liferent use only, and at the death of the survivor to two sons of the wife by a former marriage, their whole heritable and moveable estate. At the date of the mutual settlement the spouses had no other property than the lease carried by the assignation. Held that the destination in the assignation to the heirs of the spouses was evacuated by the mutual settlement. Walker v. Galbraith, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 347.

Destination over to issue of deceasing child—Whether clause postponing payment in case of child applicable to child's issue.

14. Held that a clause in a trust-settlement postponing payment of provisions to the truster's children until they respectively attained majority did not apply to a destination over in favour of a child's issue. White's Trustees v. White, June 20, 1896, p. 836.

Faculties and Powers—Power to select articles of furniture—Testamentary exercise of power.

15. A testator directed his trustees to deliver to M., his widow, "such articles of jewellery, linen, silver-plate, books, and other household furniture belonging to me as she may choose to select for her own absolute use," and to allow her and his daughter and the longest liver of them the liferent use of his mansion-house of Easter Livelands, "and also such articles of household furniture, plate, . . . and plenishing of every description which shall be found at the time of my death remaining after the said M. shall have made her selection as aforesaid, or the whole in case of no such selection being made." After the testator's death his widow and daughter lived together at Easter Livelands for a number of years, in joint possession of his plate, jewellery, and furniture. The widow did not during her life exercise the power of selection given her by the testator, but she left a settlement whereby she bequeathed to different legatees certain of the articles to which the power applied. Held (1) upon the construction of the husband's settlement, that the power of selection given to the widow was a power to be exercised within a reasonable time after the testator's death; and (2) that the power had not been exercised within due time, and had lapsed. Macdonald's Trustees v. Bain's Trustees, July 2, 1896, p. 913.

Vesting—Direction to divide among children of daughter in event of daughter "leaving issue."

16. A testator directed his trustees to pay the interest of a sum of £36,000 equally amongst his three daughters, and continued—"On the death of my said daughters respectively leaving lawful issue, I hereby direct my trustees to divide amongst the issue of each of my said daughters," one-third of the foresaid sum of £36,000. A, one of the daughters, who survived the testator, died leaving two children, and predeceased by two other children, who had survived the testator, but had died childless. Held that the gift to the issue of the daughters did not vest until the death of the daughters respectively, and consequently that the representatives of the predeceasing issue of A took nothing. Garland's Trustees v. Macaulay's Executors, March 12, 1896, p. 598.

Vesting—Repugnancy—Power to trustees to postpone payment—Conditional institution of children of beneficiary dying before payment.

17. A testator, by the fifth purpose of his settlement, directed his trustees to divide the residue of his estate in certain proportions among his children. Terms of a later clause which were held not to be repugnant to the gift in clause fifth, but were to be read as effectually qualifying that gift, so that portions of capital retained by the trustees from the share of a son in the exercise of the power conferred on them by the later clause, and in their hands at the death of the son, leaving issue, did not vest in such son. White's Trustees v. White, June 20, 1896, p. 836.

Vesting—Direction to trustees to pay at postponed period—Whether "children" includes "grandchildren."

18. A testator directed his trustees to pay the free income of the trust-estate to his widow, and after her death or second marriage to "pay to or apply for behoof of my children until the youngest attain the age of twenty-one years complete the free income of my said estates." The testator further directed his trustees,—"So soon as convenient after my youngest child attains the age of twenty-one years complete, and after the interest of my said spouse has ceased by her decease or having entered into another marriage, my said trustees shall either convey or pay over the whole of the free residue of my estates to my children equally, the issue of any child who may have predeceased leaving issue coming in place of and taking the share which would have been taken by the predeceasing parent if in life." In a special case presented after the widow's death, held (1) that vesting of the residue was postponed until the youngest child attained twenty-one years of age; and (2) that from the date of the widow's death till the time when the youngest child attained twenty-one years of age the income fell to be divided among the testator's surviving children, and that the issue of children who had died were not entitled to participate therein. Adam's Trustees v. Carrick, June 18, 1896, p. 828.

Vesting—Vesting subject to defeasance—Liferent and fee.

19. A testatrix directed her trustees to invest the sum of £1300, and divide the annual interest therefrom equally between her nieces Jane and Isabella during their joint lives, and on the death of either without lawful issue, to pay the whole annual interest to the survivor; but in case either should die leaving lawful issue, then such issue should be entitled to their parent's share of said interest; and upon the death of the survivor one-half of the said sum should be paid to the lawful issue of each of Jane and Isabella; "but declaring always, that if either or both of the said Jane and Isabella shall die without leaving lawful issue, then the half or the whole of said £1300, as the case may be, shall, on the death of the survivor, be paid by the said trustees to my brother, the said Robert Cumming." The testator was survived by the two nieces, who were not married, and by Robert Cumming. Held that the fee of the sum of £1300 vested at the death of the testatrix in Robert Cumming, subject to defeasance to the extent of one-half in the event of Isabella leaving issue, and to the extent of the other half in the event of Jane leaving issue. Cumming's Trustees v. Anderson, Nov. 15, 1895, p. 94.

Vesting—Declaration as to term of vesting—Destination to survivors—Conditional institution of issue of predeceasers—Conditio si sine liberis.

20. A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of the residue of his estate to his daughter and her husband, and at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the survivor, to divide and pay the whole residue, equally, share and share alike, among their children, and the survivors and survivor of them, declaring that payment should not be made to any grandchild till the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after reaching majority. "Further, in the event of its happening that all of my said grandchildren predeceased the terms of payment of their respective provisions, without leaving lawful issue, and all of which provisions it is hereby declared shall vest at the said terms of payment so fixed by me, then and in that case, but in that case only,

SUCCESSION—Continued.

I direct my trustees . . . to divide, pay, and make over my estate, hereinbefore settled on my said grandchildren, equally, share and share alike," among certain nephews and nieces. The testator was survived by his daughter and her husband. The latter outlived his wife, and died on 21st March 1895, predeceased by four children who had survived their grandfather, the testator, and survived by two children, of whom one, Mrs N., died on 17th April 1895, leaving issue. Held (1) that no share of the residue vested in Mrs N., in respect that she predeceased the term of Whitsunday 1895, which was the term of payment; and (2) that her issue were entitled, in virtue of an implied conditional institution in the trust-settlement, to succeed to the half of the residue which would have fallen to their mother, had she survived the term of payment. Neville v. Shepherd, Dec. 21, 1895, p. 351.

Vesting—Fee and Liferent—Liferent allenarly, with fee to issue.

21. A testator directed his trustees to convey his whole estate to his children "equally among them, share and share alike," the conveyance "to be made at the periods and subject to the conditions following . . . and if a daughter or daughters, upon her or their severally attaining majority, but my said trustees are in this last case hereby directed and required to reinvest the share or shares of my estate coming to her or them . . . taking the conveyances or securities thereof in favour of my said daughter or daughters in liferent for their liferent use allenarly, and to their child or children to be lawfully procreated of their bodies in fee." The trustees conveyed to trustees nominated by a daughter, who had reached majority, her share for her liferent use allenarly, and to her children in fee. She died without issue, leaving a will, which disposed of her share. Held that the daughter's share had vested in her, and was carried by her will. Stewart's Trustees v. Stewart, Jan. 22, 1896, p. 416.

Vesting—Long Lease—Destination—Conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit.

22. Certain subjects were leased for 950 years to A. P., "and his heirs as after mentioned," and failing him "then the whole subjects to and in liferent only to the present wife of the said A. P. . . . and after the death of the said spouses . . . then to the children of their marriage equally between them, share and share alike, in fee." A. P. was survived by his wife. Three children of their marriage were alive at the date of the lease, of whom two survived their father. Held in a competition as to the right to the lease on the death of the widow, that the right to the lease, subject to the widow's liferent, had vested on the death of the father in the two children then alive to the extent of one half each, and that a daughter of the third child who had predeceased that date had no right, as the conditio si sine liberis did not apply, the lease having been granted by a stranger to the family, and not as a parental provision. Marquis v. Prentice, March 12, 1896, p. 595.

Satisfaction—Debitor non præsumitur donare—Proof—Extrinsic Evidence.

23. In an antenuptial marriage-settlement between S. and C., his intended wife, J., a stranger covenanted to pay, at his death, to the marriage-contract trustees £4000 free of duty, with interest at 4 per cent from that date till payment, to be held for C. and her husband, or survivor, in liferent, and their children in fee, and failing children, to be held for J. absolutely. By the marriage-contract C. was bound to assign acquirenda to her marriage-contract trustees to be held in trust for behoof of herself and her children, and failing children, her executors. By his trust-disposition and settlement J. directed his trustees to pay "a legacy" of £4000 to C., providing that she should be allowed 5 per cent interest so long as she should allow it to remain "as part of the share of the Indigo Concern." Held (1) (aff. judgment of Second Division) that this legacy was not in satisfaction of the marriage-contract provision, and that J.'s trustees were bound to pay both sums; and (2) that J.'s trustees were not entitled to lead evidence to shew that J. used the word "legacy" as meaning "provision." Johnstone v. Haviland, Feb. 17, 1896, H. L., p. 6.

Election—Equitable Compensation.

24. By a universal settlement a testator conveyed his heritable estate to his widow in trust, for behoof of herself in liferent and of his son in fee. He conveyed his whole moveable estate to his widow absolutely. The son having claimed legitim, the widow raised an action against him for declarator that the heritable estate belonged to her in fee-simple. The Court appointed the son to state in a minute whether he averred that the value of his interest in the heritable estate, subject to the pursuer's liferent, exceeded the value of his legitim with the interest accrued thereon, and the son having lodged a minute stating that he did not make this averment, the Court held that the pursuer was entitled to the lands in fee-simple to compensate her pro tanto for the loss which she had sustained in consequence of the defender's election. Ross v. Ross, July 15, 1896, p. 1024.

Election.

25. Observations (per Lord Kinnear) on the circumstances in which a widow, who has expressly accepted the provisions made for her in her husband's settlement, might still be entitled to recall her election and to claim jus relictæ. Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson, July 9, 1896, p. 1006.

Mutual Settlement.

26. Mutual settlement between spouses—Power to revoke—Reasonable provision for wife—Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861, sec. 16. Mudie v. Clough, July 17, 1896, p. 1074.

Annuity—Contribution of separate estates to common burden.

27. Where two heritable estates, which were both subject to the common burden of an annuity, passed into the possession of separate proprietors, held, in a question between these proprietors, that each estate was bound to contribute to the annuity from year to year, in proportion to the amount of its free rental after deduction of the interest on prior burdens. Ferrier v. Cowan, March 20, 1896, p. 703.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Bond and Disposition in Security of a Superiority—Maills and Duties.

1. Held that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security of a superiority, with an assignation to feu-duties and casualties, has no title to sue an action of maills and duties against the vassal of his debtor for recovery of the feu-duties. Nelson's Trustees v. Tod, July 9, 1896, p. 1000.

Reservation in feu-charter—Power to "search for and work out" coal—"Shank or open the ground"—"Close or garden."

2. A feu-charter, dated in 1728, contained a reservation in the granter's favour of the coal under the subjects feued, with power "to search for, work out, and dispose of the said coal, . . . and provided that, in searching for or working said coal we doe not shank or open the ground within the house, office-houses, closs, or gardens to be built or made upon the said lands." In 1895 a successor of the granter commenced boring operations at a spot which was within thirteen yards of one of the main entrances of the mansion-house built upon the feu, and which was situated in an artificially made and enclosed piece of ground laid out partly in grass and partly in flower beds. The bore was sunk in the part laid out in grass. In a note of suspension and interdict presented by the feuar to have the boring operations interdicted, held (1) that "boring" was covered by the expression "opening the ground"; and (2) that the place where the operations were being carried on was a "closs or garden" in the sense of the charter, and was therefore within the prohibited area. Macdonald v. Welsh, July 9, 1896, p. 995.

Reservation of freestone with right to feuar to dig freestone for building on feu—Whether railway bridges and other works within right.

3. A feu-charter, which reserved the freestone to the superior, gave power to the feuar, notwithstanding the reservation, to dig or work the freestone for erecting "houses and offices, or walls or other buildings" upon the feu, or for making or repairing the roads thereon. A railway company having taken over the feu by compulsory purchase, held that it was within the powers of the feuar to dig freestone for the construction of bridges and other railway works on the feu. Davidson's Trustees v. Caledonian Railway Co., Oct. 29, 1895, p. 45.

Reservation of minerals—Lease of minerals—Damage caused to feu by working of minerals—Action by feuar against granter—"All parties not called."

4. A granted a feu of certain subjects, reserving the minerals, and afterwards leased the minerals. Injury having subsequently been occasioned to the surface of the feu by the workings of the mineral tenants, the feuar raised an action of damages against A. The defender, averring that the injury was due solely to the fault of the mineral tenants, pleaded, "All parties not called." Held that the pursuer was entitled to proceed with his action without calling the mineral tenants. Highgate & Co. v. Magistrates of Paisley, July 9, 1896, p. 992.

Reduction by vassal of the feu-contract in favour of his predecessor on the ground that it was ultra vires of the granter.

5. A feu granted by trustees in 1867 was sold by the vassal in 1888 to A, who recorded the disposition in his favour in the Register of Sasines, and thereby obtained an implied entry. In 1895 A raised an action against the trustees for reduction of the feu-charter, on the ground that it was ultra vires of the trustees. Held that the ground of reduction stated was not relevant, in respect (1) that the pursuer, if prejudiced, was not prejudiced by the feu-charter, but by the contract he had made with the original vassal, to which the trustees were not parties; (2) that the pursuer, being an entered vassal, was not entitled to reduce the feu-contract without clearing the record of the disposition in his favour. Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 287.

Ultra vires—Prescription.

6. Question, whether a feu-charter granted by trustees in 1867, and bearing to be granted in the exercise of powers conferred by a private Act of Parliament (which was mentioned), and only in so far as consistent with the Act, could be validated by prescriptive possession, so as to exclude the plea that it was ultra vires of the trustees in respect that the conditions of the Act had not been complied with. Tayport Land Co., Limited, v. Dougall's Trustees, Dec. 13, 1895, p. 287.

Building restrictions—Personal objection—Servitude—Real burden.

7. In 1871 Harper, the proprietor of an area of unbuilt-on ground in Glasgow granted a bond and disposition in security over the ground, reserving power to feu the same, it being declared that the superiority of the lands feued should be subject to the security. Thereafter Harper feued out part of the ground under building restrictions, and bound himself to take the feuars in the unfeued plots bound to conform to these restrictions, which were declared to be essential qualifications of the feu-contract and real liens and burdens upon the plots thereby disponed, and in so far as declared in favour of the vassal, a real lien and burden on the remainder of the ground. Buildings were erected on the plots feued in conformity with the feu-contracts. Subsequently the superiorities of the plots feued were sold with the consent of the bondholder, and the security was restricted to the unfeued ground. In 1894 the bondholder, under the powers in his bond, sold the unfeued ground, and the purchasers having proposed to erect on the ground houses which were disconform to the restrictions, the proprietors of the feus granted by Harper brought an action against the purchasers of the unfeued ground to have it declared that the ground was subject to the building restrictions and conditions contained in Harper's feu-contracts. The Court assoilzied the defenders, holding (1) that as the defenders had not acquired the superiorities of the feus granted by Harper they were not liable in the personal obligations undertaken by him to the feuars; (2) that the personal obligations undertaken by Harper to the feuars after he had granted the bond with power of sale could not affect the right of the bondholder or of his successors in the unfeued ground; (3) that the restrictions had not validly been made real burdens on the unfeued ground, as they did not enter the titles thereof; (4) that the feu-contracts granted by Harper could not create a servitude altius non tollendi over the unfeued ground, in respect that there was no separate and distinct condition as to height, although a limitation as to height might be inferred from the conditions of the feu-contracts as a whole; (5) that assuming the defenders to have been in the knowledge of the conditions in Harper's feu-contracts, they were not thereby barred from erecting buildings inconsistent with these conditions. Morier v. Brownlie & Watson, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 67.

Building Restrictions—"Villa."

8. A feu-charter provided that the vassal should not be entitled to erect on the feu "buildings other than villas." He proposed to erect thereon a row of contiguous self-contained houses of two storeys, with separate gardens, before and behind. The superior objected. Held that the proposed buildings were not "villas." Millar v. Trustees for Endowment Committee of Church of Scotland, March 4, 1896, p. 557.

Building restrictions—Feu-disposition—Plan annexed to disposition.

9. A proprietor who had prepared a general feuing-plan of his estate sold part of it and bound himself in the disposition granted by him "to adhere to the general feuing-plan of our said lands, and to erect on the lands houses of the character and style indicated thereupon . . . a reduced copy whereof is hereto annexed, and signed as relative hereto, and to give effect to this condition in all feu-contracts, dispositions, and other conveyances of the plots of ground shewn on the said feuing-plan, and which declaration is also hereby declared to be a real lien and burden upon our said lands." The plan was merely a ground-plan shewing the building line of the streets. On the line of the building were written the words "for self-contained lodgings and corner tenements." In an action by the disponer against the disponees for declarator that the restriction was not binding, held that the clause imported no more than it expressed, viz., an obligation on the disponer to build houses of a certain description, and that, as it was not contended that anyone could compel the disponer to build, the clause had no effect. Assets Co., Limited, v. Lamb & Gibson, March 6, 1896, p. 569.

Obligation to make road—Feu-contract—Jus quæsitum tertio.

10. By feu-contract, dated in 1871, B's trustees, the first party, disponed two plots of ground, part of the lands of Blochairn, to C D, the second party, their heirs and assignees, "declaring, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that a street" of 60 feet in breadth should be made along the south of the plots of ground disponed, and that it should be formed upon such levels as the first party (B's trustees) or "their successors in the said lands and estate, including any parties who have feued or who may feu or purchase the ground on the opposite side of the said street," and the second party or their foresaids might think fit, "having regard to the continuation of the same eastward, so as conveniently to accommodate the portion of the first party's remaining lands lying . . . to the east of the ground hereby feued." It was further provided that the second party and their foresaids should be bound, whenever required "by the first party or their foresaids, including as aforesaid," to make the one-half of the roadway situated next to the plots of ground thereby disponed. It was further declared that the first party and their foresaids should be entitled to give a power to use the said street, and any others that might be formed by the second party and their foresaids in the ground disponed, to their feuars in the remaining parts of their lands of Blochairn, and that the second party and their foresaids should have power to use any streets which should be formed by the first party or their feuars in the remaining portions of the lands of Blochairn, and the first party bound themselves to insert clauses sufficient to secure those subjects in all future conveyances of the lands of Blochairn or parts thereof. In 1877 B's trustees sold and disponed parts of the lands of Blochairn, lying to the east of the ground feued in 1871, to E F, with their "whole rights, title, and interest, present and future therein." The disposition imposed no obligation to construct any road upon the disponees, and contained no reference to the obligation imposed upon C D by the feu-contract of 1871. In an action by E F to compel a successor of C D to implement their obligation in the feu-contract of 1871 to make the sixty feet road, held that the pursuers had no title to sue in respect that (1) the disposition in their favour did not contain any assignation of the rights of B's trustees under the feu-contract of 1871; (2) they were not successors of B's trustees in the lands of Blochairn, or feuars upon the south side of the proposed sixty feet street; and (3) there existed no mutuality of rights and obligations between them and the vassals under the feu-contract of 1871. Stevenson v. Steel Co. of Scotland, Limited, July 17, 1896, p. 1079.

TRADE NAME. Hotel—Hotel Sign—"Golden Lion"—Interdict.

In January 1896 the proprietors of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling, raised an action against Lennox, the tenant of that hotel, and proprietor and occupant of the Station Hotel, Stirling, to interdict him "from using in any way upon or in connection with the Station Hotel a gilt figure or trade sign of a lion, or any painted or printed copy or facsimile thereof which has been used in connection with and recognised as the trade sign of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling." Held that, having regard to the fact that the words "Station Hotel" were conspicuous on that hotel, the use of a gilt lion on the roof implied no representation that the business of the Golden Lion Hotel had been transferred to it, and did not tend to mislead the public, and that as the pursuer did not aver that any members of the public had in fact been misled, he was not entitled to prove that such was the fact. Crawford's Trustees v. Lennox, May 22, 1896, p. 747.

TRAMWAY. Burgh—Street—Obstruction of street—Nuisance—Interdict.
A tramway company which had a statutory right to use certain streets in a town for their traffic were in the practice, when a snowstorm occurred, of removing the snow from their tramway lines to the sides of the streets by the use of a snow-plough, and of afterwards scattering salt upon the lines. The town-council, which was the Local Authority, approved of these operations. In a suspension and interdict brought by an inhabitant to have the tramway company interdicted from continuing this practice, held that as the Local Authority were entrusted with the duty of seeing that the streets were cleared in such emergencies as a heavy snowstorm, and as they approved of the methods employed by the tramway company, the note of suspension and interdict fell to be refused. Ogston v. Aberdeen Tramway Co., Dec. 20, 1895, p. 340.

TRUST. Constitution—Implied trust—Mortgage over ship—Agreement for repayments out of profits—Specific appropriation—Breach of trust.
1. A offered to advance to a shipping company £15,000 on a mortgage over a steam vessel, on "condition that all profits earned by the steamer to be paid to us towards reducing the loan till the loan shall have been reduced to £10,000." The managing committee of the company agreed to accept the offer, subject to the modification "that instead of all the profits being paid to A till the mortgage was reduced to £10,000, they should be paid at the rate of £2000 per annum until then." A agreed to the modification, and the arrangement was approved by the company. Subsequently the advance was made, and the mortgage granted. The company went into liquidation. Held that the agreement imported merely a personal obligation by the company to pay to A £2000 per annum from profits, and that A had no preference over the profits. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel, Nov. 7, 1895, p. 84.

Constitution—Inter vivos disposition—Right to revoke.
2. By trust-disposition and assignation S assigned and disponed certain heritage described in the deed, and the whole remainder of her estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees, first, for behoof of herself in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of any husband she might marry; and second, for behoof of her two sisters and their respective heirs in fee. In the third place, she provided that, notwithstanding the above provision of liferent and fee, it should be within the power of her trustees, at any time, in their sole discretion, to advance to her the whole or such part of the capital as they might think fit. She further declared that the deed should be held as an alimentary provision for behoof of herself, and should not be affectable or attachable by her debts or deeds, or the diligence of her creditors. The deed was delivered to the trustees, who accepted office, and was thereafter recorded in the Register of Sasines. Held that the deed was not revocable by S. Shedden v. Shedden's Trustees, Nov. 29, 1895, p. 228.

Constitution—Universal trust-disposition—Power to revoke.
3. A trust-disposition was executed in the following terms:—"I . .

TRUST—Continued.

appoint" A and B, "my trustees and managers of my affairs, and that absolutely, and for that purpose I assign, dispone, and make over to them . . . my whole heritable and moveable property . . . And I direct my trustees as follows:—(First) My said trustees shall take possession of my estates foresaid, as I hereby authorise them to do, for the purposes after mentioned; (Second) My said trustees will give me the free income of my estate during my lifetime, and I undertake not to interfere with them in any manner of way; (Third) At my death I direct my said trustees to dispose of my estates after making payment of the legacies after mentioned." Directions then followed as to the disposal of the truster's estate at her death, and the payment of legacies, and the deed concluded with a clause recalling and cancelling all prior settlements executed by the truster. Held that the deed was to be construed as creating a trust for administration only, that it did not divest the granter of her right to the estate conveyed, and that it was revocable. Byres' Trustees v. Gemmell, Dec. 20, 1895, p. 332.

Administration—Application for directions of Court—Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889, sec. 18.

4. Held that it was not competent for the Court, upon a report by the Accountant under section 18 of the Judicial Factors Act, 1889, to give directions as to whether trustees should or should not delay to sell heritable estate, which the testator had directed them to sell at such time as they thought advantageous or expedient, that not being a question which related to the investment or to the distribution of the estate. Earl of Stair's Trustees, July 17, 1896, p. 1070.

Administration—Appropriation of investments to particular legacies—Incidence of loss on such investments.

5. Circumstances in which it was held that an appropriation of deposit-receipts by trustees to particular legacies was ultra vires, and that loss which had accrued on these deposit-receipts fell upon residue. Scott's Trustees v. Scott, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 52.

Administration—Power to retain securities on which funds invested at truster's death—Liability of trustees—Deposit-receipt—Term of payment—Guarantee of Indemnity.

6. A testator empowered his trustees to retain securities upon which his estate might be invested at his death. The trustees accordingly retained certain deposit-receipts with a foreign bank which were not yet payable, under a guarantee from two of their number to indemnify them from all loss which they or the trust-estate might incur by continuing to hold the said deposit-receipts. Before the deposit-receipts matured the bank suspended payment. Held that neither the trustees nor the guarantors were liable to make good the loss sustained by the bank suspending payment, as it did not appear that the deposit-receipts could have been realised before they matured. Scott's Trustees v. Scott, Nov. 1, 1895, p. 52.

Administration—Personal liability of trustees—Failure to fulfil trust directions as to audit of factor's accounts.

7. A truster empowered his trustees to appoint a factor, who might be one of their own number, and directed them "annually, within one month after the 31st day of December in each year during their administration, to cause their factor to make up an account of the intromissions had by him in virtue hereof in the course of the year ending on that date, and to lay the same, with the whole vouchers thereof, before them, to be by them examined and audited." The trustees did not obey the truster's direction as to an annual account and audit, but the factor's accounts were occasionally rendered and examined. The factor's account for the period from 1st March 1888 to 1st June 1890, which was correct, and was examined by the trustees, shewed that the trust-estate was due to the eu granted by trustees in 1867 was sold by the vassal in 1888 to A, recorded the disposition in his favour in the Register of Sasines, thereby obtained an implied entry. In 1895 A raised an action nst the trustees for reduction of the feu-charter, on the ground that as ultra vires of the trustees. Held that the ground of reduction d was not relevant, in respect (1) that the pursuer, if prejudiced, not prejudiced by the feu-charter, but by the contract he had made the original vassal, to which the trustees were not parties; (2) the pursuer, being an entered vassal, was not entitled to reduce u-contract without clearing the record of the disposition in his . , whether a feu-charter granted by trustees in 1867, and bear- e granted in the exercise of powers conferred by a private Act ament (which was mentioned), and only in so far as consistent e Act, could be validated by prescriptive possession, so as to the plea that it was ultra vires of the trustees in respect that itions of the Act had not been complied with. conveyed to certain persons named and to such other persons be assumed in terms of law to act in the trust, as trustees for the trust, his heritable and moveable estates. He directed s, inter alia, to retain and invest £4000 for behoof of his ferent allenarly and of his issue in fee, and on the death of issue to pay the sum to the testator's other sons, subject to n that "in case at any time my trustees may in the exer- judgment and discretion think it prudent and advisable to pay over" to D "the whole or any part of the principal of the said sum of £4000 as his own absolute property, they shall have, and they are hereby granted full power, authority, and liberty to do so, . . . it being my intention to give to my trustees the same full powers and discretion in giving the said principal sum" to D, "which I myself now possess." A judicial factor who had been appointed in room of the trustees, who had resigned, presented a petition, bearing to be at D's request, for power to invest a portion of the £4000 in the purchase of an annuity in favour of D and his wife, and the survivor of them. The Lord Ordinary refused the petition, on the ground that the trust-deed did not authorise any payment for behoof of D's wife. The judicial factor having reclaimed, and lodged a minute stating that in his opinion the proposed application of the portion of the trust-estate was prudent and advisable, the Court, holding that the proposed investment, being at D's request, was virtually a payment to D himself, granted the prayer of the petition. Howden v. Simson, Nov. 16, 1895, p. 113.

Administration—Power to withhold payment—Exercise of power.

11. A truster, after directing his trustees to divide the residue of his estate amongst his sons on their attaining majority, provided that the capital of one-half of their shares should not be payable to them until the age of twenty-five; "declaring, nevertheless, that my trustees shall have power to pay to any of my sons the capital of the said half, in whole or in part, as soon after he shall have attained majority as they shall deem advisable, and that, on the other hand, my said trustees, if they shall consider it for the interest of any of my sons, shall have power to withhold payment of the capital of such half . . . even after he shall have attained the age of twenty-five, . . . and that either during the remainder of his life or for such shorter period or periods as my said trustees shall from time to time determine," meantime paying him the interest. One of the sons survived his father, and died two years after attaining the age of twenty-five, without having received payment of the whole of his one-half share of the residue. The trustees had not recorded any minute determining to exercise their power to withhold payment, but they had in point of fact not paid, without protest on the part of the son. Held that in retaining the portion of the one-half share the trustees were to be presumed to have acted in the exercise of the power conferred on them, and there being no evidence to the contrary, that there had been a valid exercise of the power. White's Trustees v. White, June 20, 1896, p. 836.

Administration—Loan—Proof—Writ—Writ of executor and trustee—Writ of beneficiaries—Res inter alios.

12. In an action of multiplepoinding brought by a testamentary trustee, a claim was lodged by A, who averred that "from time to time she made loans of money" to the truster amounting in all to £390. In support of her claim A referred to a minute of agreement entered into between the truster's widow, since deceased, who was at the time his executrix and sole trustee, and his eldest son, under which the son took over at a valuation a crop and stocking on certain farms of which the truster had been tenant. There was appended to the minute, which was tested, a state of the trust funds, and among the "outstanding debts" was entered "sum on debt due to" A "£390." The state was signed by the widow and eldest son, and appended to it was a docquet signed by the truster's other children who, with the widow and eldest son, were the beneficiaries under his will, approving of the minute of agreement, and also "approving of and holding as correct, and duly vouched" the state of trust funds. A, to whom the document had not been delivered or exhibited at any time, maintained that the debt of £390 was proved by it, or alternatively that it raised a prima facie case of loan which she was entitled to supplement by parole proof. Held (1) that the docquet was not a writ binding on the beneficiaries as in a question with A, but was merely an admission or discharge by them in favour of the truster's widow; (2) that the entry of the sum of £390 was ineffectual to prove a debt due by the trust-estate, in respect (a) that the writ in which it occurred was not delivered to A as an acknowledgment by the trustee that the debt was due, and (b) that such an acknowledgment, if delivered to A, would not have been binding on the trust-estate; and (3) that the writs being themselves insufficient to prove the constitution of a loan there was no room for parole proof to any effect. Dunn's Trustee v. Hardy, March 12, 1896, p. 621.

13. Held that a minute of resignation by a trustee, in the form of the Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 10, Schedule A, could not be revoked after intimation to the co-trustees, although it did not take effect in terms of the statute till a subsequent date. Fullerton's Trustees v. James, Nov. 16, 1895, p. 105.

Removal of Trustee—Non-gratuitous Trustee—Petition—Inner-House—Nobile officium—Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1891, secs. 2 and 8.

14. In a petition to the Inner-House for the removal of a trustee on the ground of incapacity, which was presented at common law, and made no reference to the Trusts Act of 1891, held that the Court, having jurisdiction to deal with the question of removal, was not entitled to treat the application as an appeal to its discretion for the exercise of its nobile officium, but was bound to apply the provisions of section 8 of the Trusts Act, 1891, and to remove the trustee on proof of his incapacity. Tod v. Marshall, Oct. 23, 1895, p. 36.

Removal of trustee—Sequestration and adverse interest of trustee.

Denuding—Demand for payment by one of several fiars with consent of liferenter.

16. A testator conveyed his heritable and moveable estates to trustees for payment of certain legacies and annuities, and for payment of the liferent of the remainder to his widow. He further directed his trustees after the death of the longest liver of himself and his wife to pay a provision of £18,000 to his son, and a provision of £8000 to each of his four daughters, and to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his son. He declared that the children's provisions should vest at his decease. The testator was survived by his widow and by his five children. The son applied to the trustees for payment of his provision of £18,000. The widow consented to the application, and offered to discharge her liferent in regard to that sum. The funds in the hands of the trustees at the date of the application were amply sufficient to meet all the children's provisions. Held that the trustees were not bound to accede to the son's demand, in respect that the daughters were entitled to pari passu payment of their provisions along with the son, and that it was possible that when the date of payment arrived the estate might be insufficient to pay the provisions in full. Haldane's Trustees v. Haldane, Dec. 12, 1895, p. 276.

Denuding—Marriage-Contract—Annuity to wife—Power to discharge stante matrimonio—Purchase of annuity in lieu of that provided in marriage-contract.

sum of £40,000 burdened with an annuity to the wife, which she had agreed to discharge, in respect that the annuity was a marriage-contract provision which the wife was not entitled stante matrimonio either to alienate or to discharge.

Held, further, that the trustees were not entitled to purchase with the trust funds an annuity in their names, payable to the wife, and, quoad ultra, to denude of the trust funds, in respect (1) that the security of the trust funds was greater than that of a purchased annuity, and (2) that a purchased annuity, not being protected by the marriage-contract trust, could be alienated by the wife. UNIVERSITY. Affiliation of College—Affiliation and incorporation distinguished—Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, secs. 15, 16, and 21.

Held (1) that the power to rescind an affiliation of a College to a University under section 5 of the Universities (Scotland) Act, 1889, was applicable only to cases of mere affiliation, and would not apply to the case of Dundee College, in the event of its being affiliated and made to form part of the University of St Andrews; and (2) that section 21 could not be construed as giving power to the University of St Andrews, after Dundee College had been incorporated with it, to revoke the ordinance making the incorporation. Metcalfe v. Cox, July 27, 1896, H. L., p. 60.

1. A tenant who under his lease had right to dig and take clay to a considerable depth below the surface made certain erections upon the ground let to him, which he used exclusively for the purpose of working the clay. Held that "clay" was a "mineral" within the meaning of exemption 2 of section 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1895. Assessor for Portobello v. Mitchell & Sons, March 20, 1896, p. 686.

Subjects—Erections by lessee—Rent calculated by minerals treated in erections—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1895, sec. 4, Exemption 3.

2. A chemical company under agreement acquired right to recover the tar and ammonia from the gases of the adjoining blast-furnaces of an iron company at a royalty of one shilling per ton on the coal consumed in the furnaces of the latter. They erected buildings for the purpose of working the gas on a piece of ground adjoining the ironworks, which had been leased to them under the agreement. Held that as the lease was not a lease of minerals, exemption 3 of sec. 4 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act did not apply. Furnace Gases Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, March 20, 1896, p. 689.

Value—Houses let by railway company to employees—Fair Annual Value—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, sec. 6.

3. The Caledonian Railway Company let houses by agreement to their employees at a rent fixed upon a general scale for their whole system, and having no relation to the values of similar houses in the locality. Held that the rent was not "conditioned as the fair annual value" of the houses, and that the assessor was justified in disregarding it and in fixing the valuation by comparison with the rent of similar houses in the locality. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Assessor for Lanarkshire, March 20, 1896, p. 691.

Value—Subjects in occupation of owners—Co-operative store—Separate industries in same range of buildings—Whether to be taken as unum quid—Valuation by percentage upon cost of erection.

4. Premises belonging to a Co-operative Association consisting of a range of buildings which included a bakery, workshops, stables, and a refrigerator, were valued by the assessor as a unum quid, by taking a percentage on the cost of erection. There was no other building within the burgh of a similar construction and applied to similar purposes. The proprietors maintained that the several portions of the premises fell to be valued as separate subjects by comparison with the value of similar subjects in the burgh. Held that the Assessor was right in valuing the premises as a unum quid by taking a percentage of their cost. St Cuthbert's Co-operative Association v. Assessor for Edinburgh, March 20, 1896, p. 681.

Value—Subjects in occupation of owners—Disused factory—Vacant workmen's houses.

5. An Oil Company having ceased to do business, a range of houses which had been erected for the use of the employees became with a few exceptions unoccupied, and from their position it was improbable that they would be again fully let. Held that they fell to be valued by taking the actual rent received for the houses which were let, and adding a nominal sum of £1 per house for those which were unlet. Burntisland Oil Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Fife, March 20, 1896, p. 683.

Value—Consideration other than the rent—Goodwill—Public-House—Value of similar premises in same district.

6. A public-house was let for ten years at a rent of £24 per annum, and upon payment to the proprietor and previous occupant of £550 in name of goodwill. The Assessor, in fixing the valuation, took one-half of the £550 paid in name of goodwill as representing the goodwill attaching to the house as a heritable subject and spread it over the period of the lease at the rate of £27, 10s. a-year, making with the rent stipulated in the lease £51, 10s. as the annual value entered in the roll. In an appeal by the proprietor, held that, in fixing the valuation, there ought to be taken into consideration, not merely the amount paid for goodwill, but also the rents or valuations of similar licensed premises in the neighbourhood.
